Netanyahu and Arafat talk

By BATSHEVA TSUR
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — In an effort to move the Hebron negotiations forward, Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu telephoned Yasser Arafat last weekend at the Palestinian Authority chairman's request.

The call followed a meeting between Arafat and Netanyahu advisers Dore Gold and Yitzhak Molcho, during which Arafat requested that the prime minister personally assure him Israel remains committed to the Oslo accords and would implement them fully.

Netanyahu reportedly assured Arafat of Israel's commitment, but pointed out that unless there were proper security safeguards for the Jewish settlers in Hebron, there would be an explosion. Netanyahu also urged Arafat to conclude the redeployment agreement, saying Arafat's foot-dragging is enabling extremists to sabotage the entire agreement.

Sources in Jerusalem said reports that a Hebron agreement would be signed in Cairo this week are unfounded.

Politicians and IDF relations strained

BY LEORA EREN FRUCHT
CJN Israel Correspondent

TEL AVIV — Relations between Israel's government and its top military brass are strained according to Prof. Zeev Maoz, head of Tel Aviv University's Jaffee Centre for Strategic Studies.

Maoz told The CJN that last week's decision by Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu to suspend Maj.-Gen. Oren Shahor had further soured relations between the government and the military.

Netanyahu suspended Shahor as top negotiator for civilian affairs with the Palestinians, after a media expose showed the general at a clandestine meeting with opposition leader Shimon Peres.

Netanyahu justified the suspension by saying the incident involved "an officer who secretly and furtively went to speak to the opposition, without reporting this, at the most sensitive stage of negotiations."

FTA goes to the Senate

By RON CSILLAG
CJN Staff Reporter

OTTAWA — The bill implementing the Canada-Israel Free Trade Accord passed third and final reading in the House of Commons last week, and now heads to the Senate.

The deal, scheduled to take effect Jan. 1, 1997, could have been delayed had a motion from a Reform party MP calling for further study of the bill been passed. Instead, it was the Reform party that introduced the motion to pass Bill C-61.

And in the Senate, it's expected that Marcel Prud'homme, a longtime, vocal critic of Israel, will have plenty to say about free trade with the Jewish state.

Prud'homme, an independent senator, was appointed to the upper chamber in 1993. Prior to that, he served as a Liberal MP from Montreal, and often railed against Israel and domestic "Zionists." Prud'homme did not return The CJN's calls last week.

Following House of Commons committee hearings on the bill late last month, Prud'homme slammed the government for proceeding with the deal.

"Not at this time, for God's sake," he said. "It is the greatest encouragement to immobility in the peace process. The duty of Canada is to send signals around the world, and the best signal is to pass [the bill] but suspend it until such time as we know the true intention of [Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin] Netanyahu."

The Senate's current composition is Liberals, 51; Conservatives, 50; and three independents.

Rob Ritter, national director of the Canada-Israel Committee, said it's hard to say whether the deal's approval in the Senate is assured. He said "certain elements" in the upper chamber "have a predisposition" on Israel-related matters.

As in the House, Bill C-61 will receive three hearings in the Senate. Following second reading, it will be debated by a committee, likely by the standing committee on foreign affairs, chaired by Sen. John Stewart.

Sen. Erminie Cohen believes the bill will "probably" pass and receive royal assent before the end of December.

CONGRESS ACCUSES B.B. OF ISOLATIONISM

Canadian Jewish Congress Leadership accused B'nai Brith's Canadian district of "dissociating" itself from the Jewish community in Canada and described the organization as "isolationist" and "parochial."

The comments were touched off by B'nai Brith's refusal to send delegates to the Congress Triennial in Montreal.

Harry J. Pachter, district B'nai Brith president, countered by saying that B'nai Brith lodges are prevented by their Supreme Lodge from being members of any other organization.

Responsibility.

As an integral part of Toronto's Jewish community, we do more than offer a service - we accept the responsibility of fulfilling some of the most meaningful religious and social traditions of our community.

Roux seeks forgiveness from the community

'I do not ask you to forget'

By JANICE ARNOLD
CJN Staff Reporter

MONTREAL – Voice quivering with emotion, Jean-Louis Roux asked forgiveness from the Jewish community and from all servicepeople who had fought in the two worlds wars for his "lack of judgment." He apologized for being the "victim of a reprehensible ignorance" 54 years ago in wearing a swastika and, however minimally, falling into the anti-Semitic and anti-war sentiment of his milieu.

It was the day after his resignation as Quebec's lieutenant-governor.

The passage of time does not mitigate the gravity of this "error," nor can it be put down as the "insouciance of youth," he said.

The latter may be an explanation, but it cannot serve as an excuse or justification, he said.

Roux met for over one hour privately with officials of Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC), B'nai Brith Canada (BBC) and the Communauté Sépharade du Québec at CJC headquarters, an appointment he kept despite his resignation.

He then read a two-page statement to the media and left without taking questions.

The Jewish leaders accepted his "declaration" as an apology and commended Roux for "having done the honorable thing in resigning." However, they regretted that separatists are using this episode "for partisan political purposes" and called for Quebec to come to terms with the fact Nazi sympathy was widespread among the elite of the time.

Roux, 74, addressed his remarks both to the Jewish community and to those who served in the two world wars and others, praising their courage in fighting "abusive and totalitarian regimes in order to permit us to live in full enjoyment of our rights and freedoms." Of the Jewish community – "victim of odious Nazi repression in the '30s and '40s" – Roux asked "indulgence."

"I do not ask you to forget; you fight justly in order that events of this painful period are neither trivialized nor erased from memory.

"You fight, we fight against all manifestations of anti-Semitism that I denounce with all my strength and that continue unfortunately to exert their ravages in Quebec, Canada and the whole world."

Coming close to tears, Roux expressed the hope that if he is thought of again "in the few years I have left to live," people will recall the good he tried to do over the past half-century. He said he also hoped his grandchildren will "show more wisdom than me" and live in a society of "tolerance, mutual understanding, generosity of spirit, benevolence."

CJC Quebec region chair Reisa Teitelbaum said, "While we understand that he was by no means the only one of his generation to do so, the gravity of his acts merited a full public apology.

"He has now expressed himself and all can appreciate for themselves the extent of his remorse.

"Certainly, he should not be judged by those acts alone, but also by his illustrious career and his contributions to society."

BBC regional director Robert Libman described Roux, a respected actor, as a "man of character and integrity" and expressed regret for the ordeal he has been through. "He deserves better."

Jedwab calls for government commission

Both CJC and BBC had called on Roux to make a full apology after an interview in L'Actualité magazine quoted him as saying he had drawn a swastika on his lab coat when he was a premedical student and had participated in an anti-conscription demonstration in 1942 in downtown Montreal, during which the windows of stores with foreign-sounding names, especially Jewish, were broken.

CJC Quebec region executive director Jack Jedwab suggested the Quebec government establish a commission of inquiry into this period, which he said many Quebec intellectuals still prefer to ignore. He also favors a review of the history textbooks in Quebec's French schools, which avoid mention of this period and continue to revere Abbé Lionel Groulx as a father of Quebec nationalism.

Jedwab proposed that the name of the Lionel Groulx metro station be changed because it is inappropriate that the anti-Semitic cleric be so honored today. The campaign might be led by Gilles Rhéaume, vice-president of the Mouvement Souverainiste du Québec, who led the demands for Roux's dismissal.

"There is a tendency among Quebec intellectuals to be very dismissive (of Quebec's fascist past)...The trivialization of this phenomenon is harmful because it does not allow Quebecers and Canadians to learn the lessons of this period" and their bearing on today's political debates.

"If anything positive can be drawn from this unfortunate affair," Libman added, "perhaps it is that we can begin to exorcise some of the demons from this very dark and silent period."

The reaction of the Jewish community to the Roux affair has been divided, Jedwab admitted. There was concern that it would appear Jewish organizations had cooperated with separatist groups' goal of removing Roux, whom they dislike for his outspoken federalism. Others felt his personal qualities and record since the war permitted forgiveness.

Neither CJC nor BBC called for Roux's resignation, but they were not satisfied with his first statement the day after the controversy broke. They felt Roux should have immediately admitted he was wrong and clearly denounced anti-Semitism.

Roux downplayed what he did as being "inspired by a...mischievous desire to show off and be provocative" and said he was not among the demonstrators who actually broke any windows. His attitudes, he claimed, were like those of a "large proportion" of Quebec youth at the time, who did not yet know about Nazi repression of the Jews."

Roux had been a Liberal senator appointed by Prime Minister Jean Chrétien in August 1994.

From the editor's desk

Parchment, a news story, and remembering

Across my desk last week I received the fifth volume of Parchment, an annual literary journal of contemporary Canadian Jewish writing. As Bill Gladstone recently noted in The CJN, Volume 5 (1996-1997) is the first issue of the journal edited by Adam Fuerstenberg and published under the auspices of the Centre for Jewish Studies at York University.

Parchment is an important periodical. It is the only journal of Jewish Canadian creative writing, the only vehicle in which the renowned and the promising writers will travel down the road of exploring and expanding upon Jewish themes.

While reading the Globe and Mail last week, my eyes snagged, like a woollen sleeve on a jagged metal edge, on a small Reuters news report on page 16 of the first section. The story was less than two inches in depth, part of a roundup of international news. I reproduce it in its entirety.

"Muslim fundamentalists slaughtered 31 people, slitting their throats between Tuesday night and yesterday morning in one of the bloodiest attacks on an Algerian village in five years of violence. Algerian security forces simply stated that 31 people died, but eyewitness survivors and relatives of the dead who visited Sid el Kebir yesterday said all had had their throats cut."

Why did the story not merit more prominent coverage than a barely noticeable brief on page 16? The slaughter in Algeria is ongoing. It is savagery and brutality of an unimaginable nature and on an unimaginable scale. Many of the 31 people whose throats had been slit were women and children. Last Sunday, 10 more people were killed in Algeria, ripped apart by a bomb planted by Muslim extremists. Since 1992, when the military government refused to accept the election of a Muslim fundamentalist government, more than 50,000 people have been killed in fighting, the majority of them murdered by religious fanatics, sacrificed in the name of God by hatred and intolerance on the altar of terror.

What type of coverage, I wondered, would the story have received if Israel had been involved?

The word for remembering, zachor, is used in the Bible, in one form or another, 222 times. It is not merely an action or a state of being, it is a moral, spiritual obligation tying together in a transcendental chord of common memory, across vast impenetrable expanses, human beings who will live hundreds, even thousands of years apart.

Earlier this week, we marked Remembrance Day.

Parents must tell their children. Children must ask their grandparents. And grandparents must be able to close their eyes at the end of the day, the poet's assurance in their hearts accompanying an inevitable rest.

"They shall not grow old, as we who are left grow old;
Age shall not weary them nor the years condemn;
At the going down of the sun, and in the morning,
We will remember them."

Two men charged with distributing racist material

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO – The attorney general of Ontario has dusted off the little-used hate promotion section of the Criminal Code to charge two Oshawa-area men in connection with the distribution of white supremacist material two years ago.

The material inundated the eastern end of the city and the adjoining community of Courtice with business-card sized flyers and stickers pasted onto hydro polls. The material attacked Jews and blacks and included "cards with swastikas and KKK-type material," said Staff Sgt. Bob Peacock of Durham Regional Police.

Thousands of flyers were distributed in the spring and summer of 1994. Some were left in school yards, others were pitched in front of homes and offices. Some hate material was delivered to Oshawa MPP Allan Pilkey's downtown office.

At the time, the Oshawa news media reported that one of the pamphlets was headlined "kill and burn all niggers now," while another called on blacks to be deported as a way of fighting crime.

One of the business-card size flyers is decorated with a swastika and the comment, "six million served." It indicated the card was printed by a neo-Nazi group in Lincoln, Neb.

Another card, also featuring a swastika, reads: "non-profit organization, Hebrew basic burial, traditional graveside service."

In commenting on the arrests, Peacock described the material that formed the basis of the charges only in general terms. It is not clear that the material cited above formed the basis of the charges. Peacock said some white supremacist material was seized by police at the suspects' homes.

Morton Marder, president of the 66-family Beth Zion Congregation, said the Oshawa Jewish community did not appear to be specifically targetted when the material was distributed. At Saturday services during the height of the blitz, "people were concerned if we were centred out in any way, but we weren't."

Marder said he stumbled onto some of the materials in front of a Roman Catholic school while going for a walk. "They were white supremacist in nature ...Certainly it was alarming," he said.

"Speaking as a Jew in a small community, I was very pleased that police were able to lay these charges," he added.

Canadian Jewish Congress also commended the Durham Regional Police, as well as the Metropolitan Toronto Police, the Ontario Provincial Police and the attorney general for their joint efforts in leading to the arrests.

Ellen Cole, chair of community relations for Congress' Ontario region, praised Attorney General Charles Harnick "for giving consent to the laying of charges ...Hopefully, these arrests and charges will send a stern warning to those contemplating the promotion of hatred against minority groups in our society."

Ironically, Congress has in the past criticized Harnick and previous attorneys general for failing to lay charges against other alleged hatemongers such as pro-Nazi publisher Ernst Zundel. Under the Criminal Code, consent of the attorney general is required before charges can be laid.

Although the constitutionality of the law has been upheld by the Supreme Court of Canada, it has rarely been used. Former Alberta teacher Jim Keegstra has been convicted under the law for promoting hatred against Jews. Two Toronto men, Don Andrews and Robert Smith, have been convicted of promoting hatred against non-whites. The last person facing hatemongering charges was former Heritage Front member Elisse Hategan, but those charges were eventually dropped when it became clear she was attempting to expose her former comrades in the white supremacist group.

Charged in connection with the Oshawa incidents are Guy Carlton Mayne, 30, and Ted Francis Beavis, 21. The pair face three joint charges of wilfully promoting hatred and one charge of conspiracy to promote hatred. Beavis faces an additional four charges of promoting hatred, Peacock said.

Congress concerned by police violence

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO – "There is a concern across Ontario about the use of deadly force by police officers in some cases," the Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region, said in its submission to a government review of civilian oversight of police operations.

It is important that police authority continues to be subject to civilian review, the region said.

"Civilian bodies which directly address citizens' complaints in relation to police conduct are vital to uphold the public trust in a democracy."

At the same time, the submission said, there are other areas under provincial jurisdiction dealing with the police and the justice system that remain a concern for visible minorities.

One of these is how the government will deal with the 400-page report reflecting concern about systemic racism in Ontario's criminal justice system.

The region's submission was signed by chair Moshe Ronen and Ellen T. Cole, community relations chair.

BJC 'near break-even' after its first year

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO – "The community realizes we are here to stay and we will recapture its past glory," said president Michael Kerbel at the recent annual meeting of the Bathurst Jewish Centre (BJC).

He was referring to the restructuring of the Jewish Community Centre in the wake of a $15-million debt two years ago. The Bloor JCC is now independent and the Valley branch at Steeles and Leslie has been sold to private interests.

"Coming to a near break-even budget is a monumental event," executive director Deborah Pinsky told BJC members in the Jerusalem Room.

"Twenty of our respected friends have guaranteed that future debts will be met," Kerbel said, predicting a bright future for the BJC and noting that basketball has attracted 500 players, a 30 percent jump.

In its first full year ending June 30, the BJC incurred an operating loss of $380,000 on revenue of $4.9 million. A much greater loss had been expected. An operating loss of $30,000 is forecast for the current year.

The operating loss for the year included $225,000 in capital expenditures, treasurer Bruce Leboff said. The total revenue of $4.9 million included $1.8 million in program fees, $1.5 million in fees from 3,000 athletic members, $602,000 from the Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto (JFGT), $370,000 from United Way and $200,000 in government grants.

This year the BJC camp program served 665 children, a record, Leboff said. The new fun centre is proving a popular spot for birthday parties. A total of 15 treadmills and 20 exercise bikes have been added to general athletic facilities.

Kerbel referred to the "infamous group of seven," supporters who kept the building going during the financial crisis. He and six others, Geoffrey Bledin, Paul Nightingale Sheila Engel, Marty Goldberg, Phil Daniels and Tom Lobel were given plaques by Sandra Brown, JFGT president.

Other volunteers given awards were Ben Swartz and Gerry Weiner of the Stroke Recovery Group, Sue Rosenblat of Early Childhood and Gerry Granek, house committee chair.

"Gerry came down at three o'clock in the morning to make sue the women's locker room had air conditioning," phys. ed. dirctor Jim Emery said.

Fun centre popular spot for birthday parties

Pinsky said the BJC has raised $600,000 in two years and has further plans for fundraising. "We're meeting the increasing needs of the community with diminishing resources."

"I'm excited to see that the parking lot is filling up again," said Brown, paying tribute to the BJC board and staff.

Vice-president Helen Finder Guttman chaired the meeting.

Congress presses for public funding of day schools

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Canadian Jewish Congress is urging two government committees to recommend to cabinet that it agree to public funding of Jewish day schools. Doing so would be in keeping with the provincial government's goals of providing school choice to parents and enhancing the fairness of the education system, Congress has argued.

The Ontario Jewish Association for Equity in Education (OJAEE), a Congress committee, recently submitted a brief to a Ministry of Education committee, which is studying the allocation and expenditure of education funds. A second brief was provided to another secretariat, established to review the way funds are raised to finance education in Ontario.

In both briefs, OJAEE argued that independent religious schools can fit into a new distribution and spending plan for the public-funded education system in Ontario. The briefs suggested that publicly funding religious schools would ensure that resources are shared fairly and that there would be no second class students in the province; that such an arrangement would increase the accountability of the schools to the government and taxpayers; that community-owned religious schools "leads to results-oriented efficiency and accountability, with respect to costs."

OJAEE also argue that such funding would "uphold the value of school choice," giving parents the right to choose how to educate their children without experiencing any financial penalty by having to fund both the public system and independent schools.

There are currently more than 10,000 students attending Ontario's Jewish day schools. Tuition fees and subsidies from community organizations provide funding for the schools. Roman Catholic schools receive full government support.

OJAEE is supporting a legal challenge to that practice brought by five couples with children in Jewish day schools. The parents argue that funding only Catholic schools violates the equality provision of the Charter of Rights and Freedoms. The case has been heard by the Supreme Court of Canada, which has yet to deliver its judgment.

Kleins deliver powerful message as program opens

By RON CSILLAG
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO – The kickoff event to Holocaust week left a lump in every throat and not a dry eye in the house.

HOLOCAUST EDUCATION WEEK

Guest speakers Gerda and Kurt Klein imparted the Holocaust's message in a personal, heartfelt way that hit home for many of the 500 who came to the annual week's launch last Thursday at U of T's Convocation Hall.

Gerda Klein is an internationally acclaimed author and speaker, who last spring accepted an Oscar for the HBO movie One Survivor Remembers. The film, which won in the Best Documentary category, chronicled her and her husband's remarkable Holocaust story.

Speaking to a hushed audience after a portion of the film was screened, the Kleins, who live in Phoenix, looked back on how the darkest days of World War II ultimately led to a tranquil, fulfilling life in America.

Gerda Weissmann was a teenager when she was deported from her hometown of Bielsko, Poland, and wound up in brutal slave labor camps just across the border in Germany. In 1945, she and thousands of other young women were forcibly marched to Czechoslovakia – a death march in which hundreds perished from exposure and hunger.

In the film, she explained that she managed to survive thanks to a pair of ski boots her father made her wear, and thoughts of which color dress she prefers.

On May 7 of that year, she met a young American soldier, her liberator. He was Lt. Kurt Klein, the man she would later marry.

Kurt Klein too has his story. He and his siblings fled Nazi Germany before the war began, and then toiled to bring their parents out. The U.S. State Department granted his parents' visas – two months after they were deported to their deaths.

"We have always considered ourselves fortunate to have fashioned a meaningful life out of war," Klein said. "The tide turned for me 56 years ago, when I joined the U.S. Army. At that moment, I went from powerless bystander to active participant."

His wife, the author of an acclaimed biography, All But My Life, which has gone through 36 editions, called her Oscar-night appearance "an incredible moment – to say to millions what I had been afraid to even whisper before. How could I possibly have even dreamt the reality of that night?"

In her years in the camps, there was not a single suicide or nervous breakdown among the inmates, she recalled. "What a marvelous tribute to the human spirit."

Her ultimate message, she said, is simple: "Never give up. The darker the night, the brighter the dawn."

As for Holocaust deniers, there is just one answer: "Germany itself has never denied it. They have paid out millions in reparations. They would never have paid a penny if they didn't have to."

Gerda and Kert Klein

Both Gerda and her husband have found succor in writing. She has penned her story in addition to children's books; he is an accomplished poet. Today, they have three children and eight grandchildren. Like so many Holocaust survivors, Gerda said, "I often ask myself why I am so lucky."

Prior to the program, Toronto Mayor Barbara Hall repeated an earlier proclamation declaring Nov. 7 to 17 Holocaust Education Week.

Hall recalled her visit last spring to Auschwitz as "the most terrifying moment in my life."

Rueful Roux

When staunch federalist Lt.-Gov. Jean-Louis Roux described his "swastika" indiscretion of some 54 years ago to l'Actualité, the separatists of Quebec immediately set their sights on him. Like frenzied hunters, the smell of their encircled prey's blood in their nostrils, they "bagged" a federalist.

The separatists struck a blow against a popular, persuasive federalist adversary and also against the federalist institution of lieutenant-governor. In a nutshell, that was the essence of the resignation drama which played itself out last week, quickly and painfully on centre stage of Quebec political life.

The separatists' moralizing and sanctimony was hollow and hypocritical.The Globe and Mail expressed it well in their editorial last week. "These are the last people who should claim the high ground. It was Jacques Parizeau who invoked repeatedly the differences between old stock Quebecers and anglophones and allophones. It was Bloc Québécois leader Michel Gauthier who raised the religion of activist Howard Galganov ... It was Lucien Bouchard who alluded to racial purity during the referendum campaign."

To be sure, the original incident of 1942 betrayed a huge insensitivity, a callous ignorance, a mocking heartlessness to the indescribable suffering of everyone caught up in the Nazi horror. But the incident must not be judged outside of its context, namely within a society generally hostile to the war and sympathetic to anti-Semitism, committed by a teenager at university. Roux had long ago recanted and repented. The apology last week was sincere and his contrition honest. The matter should have ended there. That it did not was more a testament to Roux's integrity than that of the people who were delighted to be challenging him.

Congratulations

President Bill Clinton won an impressive victory last week. He returns to the White House for a second term, the head of state and the commander in chief of the most powerful country on earth. Though his margin of victory over Bob Dole was wide, he has already been served with notice from some of the leaders of the Republican Congress that his margin of comfort in governing may be very thin indeed.

Such is the nature of American governance. To a large extent, their system of checks and balances rests on partisanship. When conducted in an atmosphere of reasonable balance, such partisanship is the basis for vital compromise and the advancement of public policy. In the extreme however, partisanship can be ugly and debasing, more food for the cynic's malicious maw, further justification for his disdain of government. But even when the Americans stoop to very low partisanship, as television seems increasingly to encourage, they generally draw the line between attacking the president/the human being and attacking the president/the office.

All the dreams and aspirations of "Americanism," however they are defined, seem bound up in the office of the presidency itself. America's face to the world is the face of the presidency. Americans understand this. Thus, there appears to be deep within their psyche a sort of in-built mechanism of measured self-restraint when it comes to hurling mud at the president/the man which seems to click in just at the right moment to prevent sullying the president/the office, and thus, in effect, sullying themselves. If only some of the other democracies, notably Israel among them, could learn the lesson of this trans-institutional relationship, that partisanship in the extreme is ultimately self-discrediting in the extreme.

The CJN congratulates Clinton and Vice-President Al Gore and wishes them the prudence, insight, courage and counsel to govern soundly and wisely for the benefit of all mankind.

Reform MP objects to CJN article

I am writing in response to the article (CJN, Oct. 31) "Controversial columnist invited to Reform event." The article is introduced by your staff reporter, Paul Lungen, through the use of a blanket statement: "Even as the Reform party attempts to chart a middle course in Canadian politics, it continues to attract members of the radical right, sometimes with the active recruitment of its own MPs."

Three events or circumstances are then described in the article: a panel discussion on Quebec, sponsored by Reform MP Ted White, at which Holocaust denier Doug Collins was a discussant; a conference of Libertarians, at which Reform MP Herb Grubel was a host and presenter, and where the conference attendees and presenters included persons with degrees of association with U.S. paramilitary groups; and the Heritage Front Web site link to the Reform party.

With respect to the reference to the Reform party on the Heritage Front Web site, persons involved with the Internet generally appreciate that it is impossible to restrict access or referent access. The Reform party has denounced the actions of the Heritage Front – both now, and during the 1993 campaign, when it was made clear to members of this group that they were and remain unwelcome within Reform.

Image and reality often have but coincidental linkages, though protentially damaging linkages nonetheless. What your columnist has done is to join three separate incidents together in the same story, to imply an underlying anti-Semitic bias on the part of the Reform party.

The reality of the CJN should be that of informed journalism. The image, from this article, is that of advocating guilt by innuendo and association. This is most regretable.

Ian McClelland, MP
Edmonton Southwest

Editors's note: Mr. McClelland does not deny the main point of Paul Lungen's story, that a Reform MP had invited a Holocaust denier to speak. Mr. Lungen left several messages including ones to Preston Manning's office which were not returned.

We reject the assertion that The CJN is advocating guilt by innuendo and association. The facts speak for themselves.

Deplores publicity for David Irving

Let me try to get this straight. When David Irving who has claimed, among other monstrosities, that Auschwitz was "built by the Poles after the war as a tourist attraction" - writes things we don't like, we zealously attack his credibility. But when he says things we do like - such as Joseph Goebbels was an unrelenting enemy of the Jews, he merits a column by the respected Rabbi Gunther Plaut in the CJN (Oct. 24).

St. Martin's Press, which was to have published Irving's book on Goebbels, withdrew its contract last March. Said Thomas J. McCormack, CEO and editorial director of the press, "The sub-text of Goebbels was, in my judgment, this: The Jews brought it on themselves."

In a revealing book entitled David Irving's Hitler: A Faulty History Dissected, Eberhard Jackel demonstrated precisely how Irving selects and chooses evidence to fit his agenda, which is to deny the Holocaust and discredit Jews, while ignoring the rest.

Although Rabbi Plaut includes a mild disclaimer, the mere fact of having chosen Goebbels for review in a notable Jewish publication lends Irving's work credence. (Let us remember that dozens of new books are ignored for every one that snags premium space.) Be assured that the Holocaust deniers will have appropriated this piece for their purposes before The CJN can say "oops."

A disservice to Joseph Kage's reputation

I know this didn't appear in the CJN but your paper identified with the contributor to the Lives Lived feature in the Globe and Mail Oct. 29 and it is a matter of common Jewish concern.

By saying Joseph Kage avoided war-time conscription because he was a teacher, the impression is clearly left that Kage because he chose teaching contrived to avoid the military draft - a distinct disservice to his reputation. What evidence is there that this was so? There is plenty of evidence on the other hand that teachers were not exempt from military service.

The Jewish Peoples School where Kage served as vice-principal was and is secular but can hardly be called left wing unless anyone to the left of R.B. Bennett can be so termed.

Its longtime headmaster Shlomo Wiseman was a Judaic scholar of note thoroughly conversant with and guided by Jewish tradition and very much at home in the sacred scriptures, which were and are reverently taught there to this day.

Gershon Cohen
Montreal

Ron Csillag responds: The reader is correct in observing that teachers as such were not exempt from compulsory military service during World War II. Inaccurate information was supplied to me. At no time did Mr. Kage conspire to avoid military duty.

The role of religion in civil society

By RABBI DOW MARMUR

Though the Hebrew Bible does not have a word for "religion," for most Jews, "religion" — as we have come to use the term in the West — is what the prophets taught. And they had very definite views about human responsibility for civil society. It was — to quote a popular prayer in Jewish liturgy — letaken olam b'malchut HaShem, "to mend the world by [the criterion of] the Kingdom of God."

The Hebrew word tikkun has become an accepted term for trying to make the world a better place through social action; you find it not only in the title of an influential contemporary Jewish journal, but also in To Mend the Word, the magnum opus by Emil Fackenheim, one of the most important Jewish thinkers of our time, whose 80th birthday we celebrated here in Toronto recently.

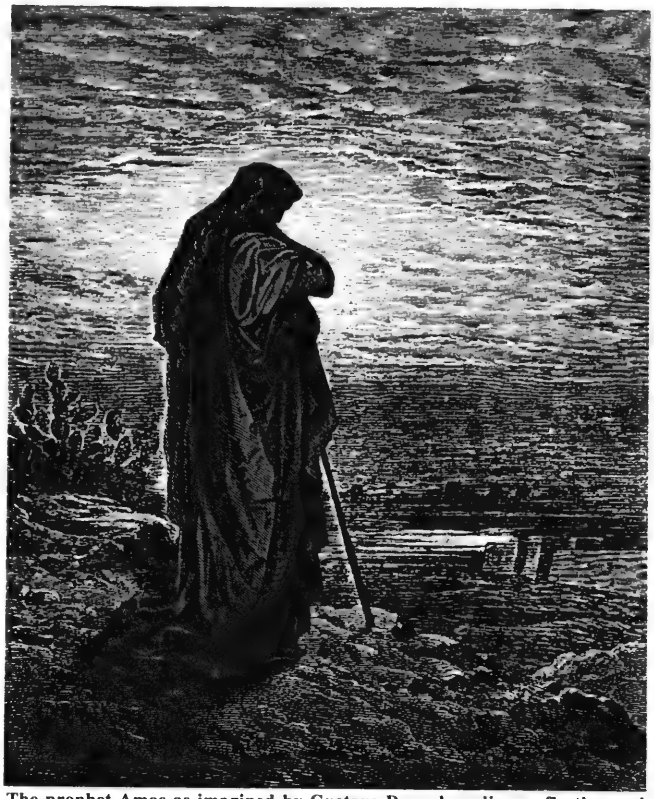
The authentic Jewish way to describe the role of religion in building civil society is to tell those in power to use it in the service of justice, as revealed by God and articulated by God's spokesmen, the prophets, of whom Moses, The Lawgiver, was the greatest. Justice is the means of preparation for the rule of God. The way we treat the weakest in society is usually the most telling indicator of success or failure.

The stress on justice points to a Messianic future, but not as a "vertical" event — something happening through supernatural intervention — but primarily as a "horizontal" occurrence — an ideal society in space and time through the efforts of earthly beings who have submitted to heavenly rule. Hence the Hebrew term Mashiach, Messiah, "the anointed," the ideal king.

This vision of an ideal future compels prophets — and their followers to this day — to be critics of the present. From the perspective of the Kingdom of God, the Kingdom of Flesh and Blood will always be found wanting. That's why the targets of the most biting prophetic critique throughout biblical literature are earthly rulers. From the challenge that Moses puts before Pharaoh in Egypt — "Let my people go" — to the formula that Zechariah (one of the last three prophets in the Hebrew Bible) puts before the governor of Judea some seven or eight centuries later — "not by night, nor by power, but by My spirit, said the Lord of Hosts" — for society to be civil, the law of God must be obeyed.

It is this principle, I believe, that shapes the role of religion in civil society: to be a corrective to the powers that be; to remind them that, for all the public relations extolling the virtues of those in power now, perfection is not yet — it is a goal which, by definition, has not yet been realized — and that their efforts must be judged by the criterion for that perfection, justice. If they move along the horizontal line toward the Kingdom of God, they will deserve our approval and command loyalty; if they don't, they must be denounced, irrespective of the personal consequences for the accusers.

Religion ceases to be part of the solution and becomes part of the problem when it is wedded to power, however brilliant the rationalizations and however noble the expressed aims of the alliance. That's why every involvement in the exercise of political power in the name of religion turns into disaster, whether it comes from "the religious right" in the United States, Khomeinism in Iran or the haggling by the political parties of Jewish Orthodoxy in Israel.



The prophet Amos as imagined by Gustave Dore, brooding, reflecting and ultimately guiding the people to strive to build a civil society. [Excerpted from Pictures of the Bible, Illustrated by G. Dore, Harbour Press, 1988]

Religionists who, in the days of the prophets, would sell out to expediency were considered to be false prophets. These political hacks in religious disguise said what their masters wanted them to say, not what God had spoken. The authentic prophets, whose writings have been preserved in Scripture, denounced them. They also accused the professional priesthood, if not of selling out to kings, then of exercising power on their own behalf, not in the name of God in whose service they had been ordained.

The tension between prophets, the emissaries of God, and kings, the epitomes of power — the spirit of God versus the aspirations of a King David in the judgment of Nathan, or of a Queen Jezebel as viewed by Elijah — and the tension between humble prophets and aristocratic priests — the custodians of organized and ritualized religion — characterize much of biblical literature. I believe that it is my duty to follow its unmistakable message.

This means it is not enough to preach it. Though the Hebrew for "prophet" (navi) really means speaker, it is in action and action alone that the words of God are tested. For that, we need to build communities. Jewish tradition understands the injunction in the Book of Exodus — "You shall be unto Me a kingdom of priests and a holy nation" to mean that it is the duty of each of us to advance the Kingdom of God not only by being critical of the Kingdom of Flesh and Blood, but above all, by creating a Kingdom of Priests, in which each member serves the others because we are all God's creatures.

The role of religion in building civil society includes uncompromising affirmation of democratic principles that allow individuals a say in the shaping of that society, not out of personal interest, but as a manifestation of commitment to, and obedience of, the word of God.

I don't wish to enter into the contemporary debate as to whether or not communitarianism is a suitable alternative, or complement, to central government. The point I wish to make is that, as I understand tradition, the building of egalitarian communities dedicated to serving humanity and God is the primary religious responsibility of every citizen. This cannot be done either by being a member of a faceless mob of a totalitarian regime or by living as a hermit, away from the world.

To live authentically as a Jew is to live in community. That's why the erosion of communal life under the pressure of that strange contemporary, all-embracing alliance between mass culture and narcissistic individualism — often manifest as consumerism — is such a threat to civil society, when viewed from the religious perspective.

It is a perspective rooted in affirmation of the covenant between God and the people. The covenantal community meets around the common objective of doing God's will as laid down in Scripture and tradition, so that God be compelled, as it were, to fulfil the divine part of the mutual agreement and bring us into the Promised Land, the Kingdom of God, Messianic times, or whatever terminology you care to use.

The Kingdom of Priests thus becomes a stage on the way to the Kingdom of God. Even if none of us individually can do God's will, we can do it jointly, in community. Therefore, tragedy can always be averted, for having lived up to our part of the covenant, it is reasonable to assume that God will live up to God's own promise.

Critics often point out that this is an exclusive kind of vision, a bourgeois version of civil society that has no room for those who are not part of the covenant. Despite all their talk about democracy and equality, Jews have often been accused of this kind of exclusivity. (But then Jews — like every minority — will always get it from somewhere: If they keep to themselves they are cliquey, if they don't they are pushy.) In truth, however, there is nothing in Judaism that bars persons from participating in the community, as long as they are prepared to take upon themselves "the yoke of the Kingdom of God," that is, the responsibilities of observing the terms of the covenant.

The authentic Jewish community is inclusive, not exclusive. But it is also tolerant of other communities. It does not believe that you must to belong to it, in order to play your part in civil society. As long as other communities share the universal vision, they are welcome, indeed encouraged, to express it in their own particular way. As long as the final destination is the Kingdom of God, the way in which communities seek to act as correctives to the Kingdom of Flesh and Blood and to manifest their citizenship in the Kingdom of Priests, should be acceptable to others.

The aim is to seek to cooperate with all like-minded communities for the common purpose of advancing the Kingdom of God. The community of such communities is what we might call civil society. Government is needed to administrate, arbitrate and, when necessary, protect. In Jerusalem of old, the Royal Palace and the Temple were always separate, but frequently interdependent.

For similar reasons, I am currently involved in efforts by leaders from various religious traditions to make a contribution to keeping Canada as one country, one civil society in which variety and diversity in the community of communities — distinctiveness — is not only tolerated but promoted and cherished. Once again, the importance of government is acknowledged at the same time as the significance of community is affirmed.

These are two examples of the kind of role religion can — and, in my opinion, must — play in building and maintaining civil society. Its objectives, to repeat, include to promote respect for denominational and other divides, yet work for unity. In the same way as each human being is different yet created in the image of God, so it should be possible to accept and promote the diversity of communities, yet affirm the unity of society.

Opinions

We haven't learned the lessons

There isn't much more that one can say or write on the occasion of the first anniversary of the assassination of Yitzhak Rabin that hasn't been said or written over the last two weeks. Between the Hebrew calendar anniversary, which fell on Oct. 24, and Nov. 4, the date of the assassination last year, Israel was filled with ceremony, commentary and analysis. But in spite of the rivers of ink that ran again, it seemed that the people were no closer than they were in the contentious days and weeks that preceded the murder.

By Shira Herzog

The "left" blamed the "right" for the atmosphere that led to the tragic event, and the "right" blamed the "left" for turning the assassination into political hay. Under pressure from its constituency, the government refused to make the anniversary of the assassination into a national day of mourning and the Rabin family responded with a frosty silence. At a youth rally to mark the event, youth movements on the religious and political right refused to sing the Song of Peace on the grounds that the left-wing Meretz party had used it as its election campaign song, and in turn, they were criticized for politicizing the memorial rally.

An especially meaningful memorial rally was held at Bar-Ilan University, where Yigal Amir had studied. Over the last year, Bar-Ilan has made a concerted effort to open its doors to dialogue and reflection on inter-community relations in Israel, as well as on the extreme ideological atmosphere fostered in some quarters of the religious-nationalist camp.

The rally at Bar-Ilan was addressed by former president Chaim Herzog, who chose to speak there because of the significance attached to that venue. In a passionate address, Herzog issued a strong challenge to Israeli society in general, but to the Zionist-religious camp in particular. Herzog's words ring with an urgency and a deep concern for the future of Israel as a community. The following is an excerpt from his address:

"I object strenuously to the attempt to wrongly cast the blame for the assassination on the entire religious-nationalist camp. I condemn any such false accusation against a significant, cherished element of our people, as though it is indirectly tainted by the crime. But the immediate consequence of the assassination should have been an unequivocal disassociation from a zealous group of extremists who speak in God's name, but have only contempt for the Torah of Israel, the values of Judaism, and the honor of the people of Israel.

"And I ask, in all honesty: Has this conclusion been reached? ... Has everything in our power been done to ensure that no such heinous crime can be committed again?... I am skeptical ... although immediately after the assassination, brave voices that called for soul searching, were heard. My sense at the present time is that these voices have gone silent. We seem to have forgotten that there were those who filled the head of the assassin with notions that made him assume a responsibility that even the Sanhedrin did not take upon itself once in 70 years.

"My roots are in the religious-Zionist camp and I educated my children in its spirit. For this reason, I have the pain at the criticism of its role and at the political and religious extremism that have relegated it to one end of the spectrum, instead of its being a bridge and an anchor for the poles.

"Yitzhak Rabin's assassination was a national tragedy of historic proportions. It can be a turning point for healing, or for further calamity ... For catastrophies of this magnitude, our sages set fast days in perpetuity, so that the soul-searching would never cease ... But it seems to me that little has changed in our lives. The candles in the squares have burned down, the shock has subsided and no profound changes have occurred in our national discourse.

"I call upon the Zionist-religious camp to assume the task. To respond to the moral challenge. To lead a new phase of national reconciliation. To return to a path that places its members at the heart of the nation, shoulder to shoulder with all other groups. To be the glue that binds the people, the Torah, our heritage and culture over and above any divisions and fragmentation.

"The challenge facing the Zionist-religious camp is first and foremost the cleansing of its own ranks, so that it can return to be a bridge between the many parts of our people. If this camp will accept this mission, will return to its centrist role and will be a moral standard for the nation — then perhaps atonement will be made for the assassination and we will be able to pray together to God for forgiveness.

"And then, and only then, will Yitzhak Rabin rest in peace."

Jewish division, Jewish strength

A year has passed since the tragic murder of Yitzhak Rabin. Rather than serving as a shock which would unite Jews in Israel and in the Diaspora, much the opposite has occurred. The deep fault lines that were there before the assassination have grown. The most important election result was not the narrow victory of Benjamin Netanyahu, but the increasing clout of the religious parties and the ongoing fragmentation of the Israeli body politic.

By Morton Weinfeld

It will be harder to find common ground between secularists and the religious camp in Israel. One reads reports from Jerusalem of women whose dress was insufficiently modest being roughed up by haredi zealots near Mea Shearim. Leah Rabin refused to give the prime minister permission to speak at the memorial at her husband's gravesite. Religious Zionist choirs refused to sing the Song for Peace, suggesting they were uncomfortable with its dovish political implications.

There is no point in minimizing these differences. In North America, tensions between the left and the right, between the non-Orthodox and the Orthodox, are likely to grow. These will be fuelled, not only by Israeli disputes, but by North American cultural and religious polarization. If friction erupts between a second Clinton administration and the Netanyahu government, the fallout will exacerbate these tensions. So would violence over Hebron or a complete break in the peace negotiations. Even, God forbid, a war with Syria fought in Lebanon might not have a unifying effect — recall the 1982 Lebanon campaign.

But these rifts should not be seen only as a cause of despair. Ironically, they are a source of strength.

Deep divisions among Jews have historically been the rule rather than the exception. This was the case in biblical times and recurred throughout the modern period. Movements such as Chassidism, the Haskalah, Reform Judaism, Zionism in its various political shadings, anti-Zionism and of course Jewish culturalist, socialist or communist ideologies, dominated and rocked Jewish life for two centuries prior to World War II. The trauma of the Holocaust and the exhilaration of the newly born Israel provided a brief consensual interlude which began to weaken in the 1970s. But internal debate and tension have been the norm. And they have returned.

These divisions within the Jewish world are ultimately a sign of vitality and flexible pluralism. Of course one wants to minimize extremist behaviors. But it makes no sense to wish for a Jewish community with no internal split. Debate, tensions and change have been constants of Jewish history. Rather than pose a danger to Jewish survival, this vigorous pluralism has been an asset. Take as an example the wide spectrum of Jewish religious identity.

The options are staggering. They range from Jewish secularism, weak but still present, to a growing ultra-Orthodoxy, with myriad options in between. And these religious options, with some exceptions, parallel the ideololgical-political splits in Israel and abroad.

The Jewish world has institutionalized these differences to a degree to which other religions such as Catholicism or Islam have not. That is not to say that those faiths do not boast reformers and traditionalists. They do. But in those groups reformers remain more marginal in the face of an authoritarian and cohesive power structure.

Jewish pluralism is fractious, no doubt about it. Recall that Winston Churchill also lamented the divisiveness and travails of democracy, calling it the worst political system save for all the rest. But Jewish pluralism offers Jews many ways of maintaining a meaningful identity or tie to the community, short of leaving. Future communal prospects may be enhanced because all eggs are never placed in one basket.

They may not like it, and some might disagree, but the Jewish so-called left — secularists, progressives, doves, non-Orthodox — and the Jewish so-called right — traditionalists, hawks, Orthodox, Haredim — need each other. They complement each other. Jewish life is richer, and Israel more secure, because of both. The debates must remain civil and non-violent, but they should not — they will not — cease.

Steinsaltz's lament

Rabbi Adin Steinsaltz of Jerusalem is the author of a modern commentary on the Talmud that has found a worldwide readership. Not everyone agrees with every interpretation he offers, but that has always been the way with us; it is a controversy for the sake of Heaven.

By Rabbi Gunther Plaut

Recently, a letter of his came to my attention. Written and published about half a year ago at Pesach time, it contains some cogent observations on the Jewish world. Here are some of them:

Over the last few decades, he writes, there has arisen a phenomenon, not entirely new, but one which has become very powerful in the life of our nation. There are people who legitimize hatred.

People are worried about what is happening in the State of Israel, about what is going to happen to the Jews living east of the former Green Line. Of course, everyone — rabbis, generals, politicians — knows the answers.

I am far more worried about what is happening on the western side of the Green Line.

There, (he continues), Eretz Yisrael is hardly ever mentioned anymore; instead we speak about the State of Israel. But there is a great difference between the two. In terms of the State, we have almost the same rights to sit in this country as the Afrikaners had, or have, in South Africa; we settled here, we built the country and developed it, and so we have the right to stay; we also have better guns and sharper bayonets. But if we intend to stay here for an extended period, then sitting on bayonets is very uncomfortable. But talking about Eretz Yisrael, the Land of Israel, on the other hand, is something else: not far from this place is the path that Abraham walked together with Isaac. This is altogether different from the saying, "We built the country and we are more powerful, and therefore we deserve to stay."

He ends his letter in the following fashion:

"We are, as a nation, in bad shape, because we are immersed in a myriad of small nonsensical details, because we are so busy hating each other, and we do not know, we do not care, we do not look at what is happening, we do not see one of the last windows that is still open to us. But things are still open to us. But things are still flexible and people can still change. The last real atheists have possibly been dead for many years; there are no more real atheists, there is no more real fight against Divinity; there is just a large percentage of people who are not practising. We are in a twilight world in which, if we die, it will be due to lack of awareness, because we did not do what we could have done. There is still a chance because people are open — confused and astray but still open for change."

Rabbi Steinsaltz wrote this from the heart of Jerusalem, but he might have written it anywhere in the Diaspora. Once upon a time, the sages argued about life and death and did so both in what was Palestine and in Babylon. Out of their arguments arose the talmudic volumes that became the life blood of our people. It is to such arguments that Rabbi Steinsaltz looks.

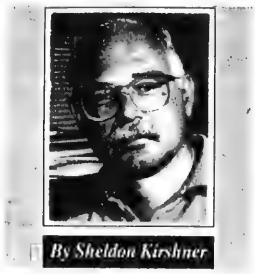
Husband-wife team tell virtually unknown story

The virtually unknown story of how Jews in Canada acquired civic and political rights has finally been told by a pair of Toronto writers.



By Sheldon Kirshner

Sheldon and Judith Godfrey's book, Search Out the Land: The Jews and the Growth of Equality in British Colonial America, 1740-1867 (McGill-Queen's University Press, $34.95), is a revelation. In methodical fashion, the Godfreys show how Canada developed into a country where the civil rights of religious minorities were an integral part of Canadian nationhood.

Distinguished Canadian historians, notably Benjamin Sack, Irving Abella and Gerald Tulchinsky, have already illuminated this topic to some extent. But it was left to the Godfreys, a husband-and-wife team who specialize in Canadian history, to put flesh "on what was until recently only the bare bones of this experience," according to Tulchinsky in a review of Search Out the Land in The Globe and Mail.

The Godfreys, a couple given to lively conversation, claimed in an interview that they are the first to have used primary sources to illustrate their thesis that Jews enjoyed a special status in British North America during the colonial era. "It's odd that, until now, no one bothered to go to the primary sources," said Sheldon Godfrey.

Over a 10-year period, the Godfreys scoured archives across Canada, the United States, the Caribbean and Britain — delving into court records, land records and probate records, reviewing long-forgotten laws and statutes and compiling family trees, all in an effort to substantiate their thesis that early Jewish settlers were in the forefront of the movement for equality of citizenship.

Jews were invited to British North America because the authorities valued their business acumen (particularly in the lucrative fur trade), their international contacts, their access to capital, their willingness to take risks and their loyalty to whichever colonial power offered them a measure of equality, the Godfreys write.

The concept of equality, rather than being an ideal in British North America, grew incrementally. An ambiguous system of disabilities discriminated against settlers who were not Anglicans. But on occasion, these restrictions were waived in the name of enhancing Britain's imperial interests.

To the Godfreys, the Plantation Act of 1740 was a turning point, the basis for the attainment of equal rights for Jews. Jewish pioneers such as John Franks and Moses David were granted landholding rights and government positions long before any similar instances in the United States or Britain.

The Plantation Act led to Lower Canada's Declaratory Act of 1832, which held that Jews were entitled to "full rights and privileges."

As a result of these changes, Aaron Hart was appointed postmaster in Trois-Rivieres, Eleazer Levy was named a notary in Montreal and John Franks was made chief fire official in Quebec.

True, there were incidents in which Jews were treated shabbily. Samuel Hart could not take his seat in the Nova Scotia Assembly in 1793. Moses Hart's son, in 1827, could not hold a commission in the militia.

"However, the evidence is that whenever an instance of unequal treatment was directly challenged, the equal rights of Jews were upheld," the Godfreys observe.

They emphasize that the gradual removal of political and civil disabilities did not usher in an age of perfection in human relations. Anti-Semitism did not, of course, disappear. But as far as the Godfreys are concerned, the equality that existed in 1867 — the year Canada became a federal state — was "advanced for its time."

Indeed, the Godfreys claim that Jews were often better off than, say, Catholics or aboriginals, and that they were actively involved in the affairs of the evolving country. Ezekiel Solomons, for example, was a major fur trader in the 18th century. His firm, Gershon Levy and Company, was based in Montreal, with branches in Detroit, Niagara and Michilimackimac.

More often than not, the Godfreys were pleasantly surprised by the degree to which Jews achieved equality. And they go further, saying that anti-Semitism was "an aberrant phenomenon" between 1740 and 1867. "We were looking for themes of anti-Semitism and didn't find them," said Sheldon Godfrey.

The Godfreys, who received the Joseph and Faye Tannenbaum Award for Canadian Jewish history for Search Out the Land, did not realize what they were getting into when they started the project.

"If we had known what it would take to finish this book, we wouldn't have attempted it," said Sheldon Godfrey, a lawyer who has an MA in Canadian history from the University of Rochester.

"We were over our heads," conceded Judith Godfrey, who holds a diploma in physical and occupational therapy and who, like her spouse, is an ardent heritage conservationist. (The Godfreys own an ensemble of historic buildings in downtown Toronto, which they lovingly restored and which they documented in Stones, Bricks and History, published in 1984).

Breaking with the inclinations of most writers, the Godfreys did not apply for a government grant when they began research for Search Out the Land. They wanted to be completely independent, beholden to no one.

Consulted archives

The Godfreys, whose previous book was an account of the life of George Benjamin, Canada's first Jewish member of parliament, not only consulted dusty archives, they also interviewed the descendants of the early Jewish settlers, the majority of whom are no longer Jewish. Several, they note with some pride, attended the launching of Search Out the Land.

When I asked the Godfreys — the parents of three grown children — how they normally divide their workload, Judith Godfrey blurted out, "Shelly is the brains." To which he retorted, "That's not true."

Their modus operandi is by now well established. Usually, she gathers the documents and he files them away. "I handle the logistics," he explained. Then, he writes the text and she edits and polishes his draft.

In common with critics who've praised Search Out the Land, they believe that it is a worthy contribution to Canadian historiography.

"On a purely academic level, we've done a lot of the homework for future historians, who will have to take account of our book," said Sheldon Godfrey.

And, they add, the voluminous documents they compiled are bound to be of invaluable assistance to serious researchers who follow in their path.

But Judith Godfrey, a feisty lady, is not entirely sure what kind of an impact, if any, Search Out the Land may have. "It depends on whether or not it's read," she said, chuckling.

Having exhausted themselves in researching and writing Search Out the Land, which they describe as their "gift to the community," the Godfreys have no immediate plans to write another book like it.

But, they allow, a children's book about Jewish settlement in Canada may be a distinct possibility.

Rabbinic Reflections

Cultural patterns were set years ago

By
RABBI ROY D. TANENBAUM

Whether wearing the jeans of 20th-century North Americans or the kapota of 18th-century Polish noblemen — whether partaking of the moccaccino that is the current local rage or the injera of the Ethiopians — whether speaking English in Toronto or Russian in Moscow — we Jews, wherever we are, tend to look and eat and sound like the people around us.

It is at once a positive and a negative. The old standard, celebrated in the Talmud, of not having changed our names or language is no longer with us. Instead, we, as a collective, pride ourselves on the fact that ours is a religion that is manifest not as we withdraw from, but as we go out and about the business of life. That Judaism can be found to apply to all manner of circumstances in which we find ourselves, we regard as a strength. Indeed, if the world were flooded again, we like to believe it would be we Jews who would show the rest of the world how to live under water.

In Canada, our kids play hockey. In the United States, baseball. In Argentina, soccer. Wherever we go, and in whatever era, we have engaged in the sports of the surrounding culture.

Except one. We box, ski, play tennis; but, statistically speaking, we do not hunt. Hunting is North America's largest participatory sport for adult males; Jews do not participate. Rashi spoke the French of his day and dressed as other Frenchmen. Maimonides spoke and wrote in Arabic and dressed as other Egyptians. Yet, as everything else, in the northern France of Rashi's days or in the Egypt of Maimonides' day, we did not hunt.

Culture, any culture, if it is worth anything, must affect its members in some way. This has to be as true of Jewish culture as any other. What is it, then, in Jewish culture that prevents us wherever we reside, at whatever period in history, from hunting?

Wanton destruction and cruelty to animals are of course forbidden in Jewish law. On these grounds, respectively, Rabbi Isaac Lampronti of 18th-century Italy and Rabbi Ezekiel Landau (the Noda B'Yehudah) in 18th-century Prague forbade hunting. But both of these are rather late; and, anyway, every culture is opposed to gratuitous destruction and cruelty, and most hunters justify themselves by saying they eat what they kill.

I believe the real element in our culture that has kept us from hunting is kashrut. A Jew could not say that he eats what he kills. For better or for worse, I believe the attitude this creates affects not only hunting, but also our view on owning guns in the home, capital punishment and a panoply of other issues including the fact that Israel has the highest per capita use of books in the world. This also suggests that if we as a community fail to preserve our basic laws, our values as a people will also inevitably change.

How exciting it is, then, to read in our Torah portion for this week that Esau was "a skilled hunter, a man of the field," and that his twin brother Jacob was "a quiet man, dwelling in tents." Esau was the brother who became the non-Jew, Jacob the one who continued the Judaism of Abraham and Isaac. Thousands of years ago, the cultural patterns were already set.

Remaining human despite inhumanity

Books

By Bernard Baskin

Carved In Stone by Manny Drukier, University of Toronto $35

I Know Who I Am by Shula Robin, Claremont Publishing $9

Why the unending flood of books about the Holocaust? Aren't we surfeited? Don't we already know — because we've been told over and over again, often in shocking and horrifying detail — that the Holocaust was the triumph of death over life, ugliness over beauty, hate over love, evil over goodness? Perhaps the books must be written to affirm those values that even the most diabolical cruelty couldn't expunge. It means to remain human, despite all the forces that strove to persuade and coerce despairing victims into grotesque forms and shapes of inhumanness.

When Manny Drukier returned to his native Poland after 50 years, he met a group of tourists who asked him how he felt after visiting Auschwitz and Majdanek? He writes, "My answer was that I wanted to scream and smash things. I could see and hear mothers clutching small children to their breasts, using soothing words to try to comfort them as the Germans loosed their dogs on them. I could see old men and children tripping over their useless bundles and valises as they were kicked and whipped and ordered to strip naked and run in snow or mud to the showers."

In 1939, when Drukier was 11, he and his family were uprooted by the Nazis, forced to leave Lodz, and plunged into a precarious existence. What would the morrow bring? Separation? Privation? Hunger? Death? Nine years later he was welcomed into Toronto by relatives and ready to face the challenges of an unfamiliar but friendly country.

Carved into Stone is the absorbing account of how a teenager survived nine years of harrowing vicissitudes, as well as a picture of Polish Jewish life before the war and during the occupation. It is also his emotional response to present day Poland, the tragic story of a vanished community.

As a youth, on his own, wild and wily, forced to live by his wits, he luckily escaped the death camps but ended up in Nazi labor camps where sadism was rampant. Finally, on a train bound for destruction, starving and desperate, he jumped to freedom. With help from strangers who hid, fed and shielded him from danger, he eluded capture and escaped to the West.

After the war, the sole survivor of his family, he was befriended by an American Jewish soldier who sponsored his immigration to the United States. It was only a short step to Canada.

This account by a successful publisher and businessman should be widely read. It is by a survivor of rare sensitivity who assures us as did Walt Whitman in a different context, "I know, I suffered, I was there."

* * * * * *

Shula Robin lost 95 members of her family during the Holocaust. She is an accomplished poet and short story writer who often reads her work to the accompaniment of music to a variety of Toronto audiences. This slender volume is alive with echoes of her perished family and filled with affection for Israel, recollections of Prague and Carlsbad and the delights and perturbations of a woman growing older in Toronto.

The honorees' dilemma

By SHEL KRAKOFSKY

The worst part of having a dinner given in your honor is that you actually have to attend.

Guest Voices

Nobody who is so honored actually believes what they are going to hear about themselves unless they are still on medication or are a direct descendant of Don Cherry. If nothing else, give these honorees credit for allowing their names to be used as hooks to bring out a crowd to donate money for my number of worthy (and sometimes dubious) causes.

The number of individuals who are willing to be feted may be running out and several are trotted out and recycled from year to year by different organizations, in keeping with the premise that if the tux fits, wear it.

As more individuals seem to be declining such invitations, dinner committees are resorting to themes. Any day now Lexpect to receive an invitation To Honor Righteous Gentiles Who Sheltered Jews During The Blue Jays World Series Parades.

Anything to entice the lovers of roast beef and Cornish hen. The hens have apparently formed a union with the cows, in order to spread rumors of their joint insanity. This will not help these dinners although it will allow innumerable members of the bovine and poultry set to continue enjoying their own meals, without listening to some (very) deadly speeches.

At these dinners, the speeches and menus are as predictable as a Canadian winter and often just as cold.

There are few certainties in life, but for sure you will hear that the honoree is a "mentsh" or if gender appropriates, an "aishet chayil." Without them, your world would be worse. And more hungry.

In terms of modesty, people who allow themselves to be honored in this fashion don't deserve to be honored. Didn't Groucho say something like that?

There is no wonder that young people turn away from participation in communal activities if this is to be the ultimate reward. They have learned that in some circles, virtue is its own reward.

In these times of limited financial resources, the need to raise money is often acute. But there must be a better way of raising money and consciousness without resorting to exaggerations about the people at the head table while institutions and causes are being bludgeoned with hors d'oeuvre.

While these dinners try to bring out the best about the honorees, the guests know it's sometimes just a bunch of whipped cream being spread on hot dogs. Some of the speeches are worthy of being nominated for the Governor General's Award for fiction.

Just listen to the whispered comments at the tables: I heard he made his money by speculating in land on Baffin Island ... You know, her cleaning lady was born in Canada ... Their kids only got into Day School because of athletic scholarships.

Admittedly, aside from the charities, these dinners do benefit the private sector. Florists make money, clothiers make money, photographers, musicians and printers all get a piece of the action. And the caterers walk away with more than dessert.

The only way to stop these orgies of eating and self and mutual massaging, is simply not to go. Boycott. Force the volunteers to come up with better ideas to convince you to part with your time and money.

And if you are asked to be the hook for an upcoming dinner, you had better refuse even if you feel you deserve it. Remember, once you accept, a curse is placed upon you. You are obliged to participate in all such banquets as a member-for-life of the organizing committee. In perpetuality. It never ends. You will forever be going to meetings, dinners — and fat farms.

I confess, I was once the subject of one of these things. Like so many others, I was being groomed for a future of speeches, table manners, guilt and platitudes. Had I known at the time where it was leading, I would have refused.

But I didn't know any better. I was only 13.

Holocaust books affirmations of life

In a ringing affirmation of her Jewish identity she vows, "My ancestors / survived floods, / pogroms, plagues, / burning in fires, / indescribable wars, / hunger, blazing sun, / freezing cold. / Despite all, / my people prevail, / renewing links in that / five thousand year / strong chain / untamed despite persecution / and pain. / I Am Eternal / I know who I am."

In My Heroic Sisters she remembers a variety of Jewish women who defied the Nazis in acts of unforgettable courage. "O Jewish maidens, / Troubadours will sing your praises, / a new tradition will be created, / during the holidays, your stories / will be told and retold from generation / to generation until the end of time."

All said and done, she laments... "We are a total patch-up / work. Life is meaningful, / yet painful, / tears convert to ice, / the soul crumbles into devastation, sorrow — / patch it up, patch it up, / patch it up. / Put a patch on the wounds / to keep it all / from falling apart."

Readers of these heartfelt, sensitive and finely crafted poems will be amply rewarded.

Montreal's Finestone honored as ORT Canada launched

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Montreal MP Sheila Finestone became the first recipient of ORT Canada's Sophie Bennett Award at the organization's founding convention, the first since the amalgamation of men's and women's ORT earlier this year.

The award was created in memory of the founding president of ORT in Canada to honor individuals who display an ongoing commitment to their community, are acknowledged for achievements in their chosen field and participate in their community on issues which reflect the welfare of citizens, societies or nations.

Avie Bennett, Sophie's son, who has endowed the chair in Jewish Literature at the ORT Braude Institute in Karmiel, Israel, in memory of his mother, honored Finestone for her involvement in issues such as "culture, dealing with minorities in the province of Quebec and the protection of minority language rights in Quebec and throughout Canada."

Finestone was also praised for her "deep concern for the welfare of the community, which has been reflected in her involvement on such varied boards as the Montreal Museum of Fine Arts and the Interfaith Task Force on Soviet Jewry.

"Last October, she received the Samuel Bronfman Award for exceptional service to the Montreal Jewish community. Finestone's longstanding commitment to ORT's philosophy can be traced to her parents, Monroe and Minnie Abbey, both of whom were staunch supporters from ORT's inception in 1942."

Keynote speaker Ellen Isler, director-general of the World ORT Union in London, England, since 1993, stressed the importance that ORT schools play in countries worldwide and said she is particularly proud of its programs in Russia, where over 8,000 Jews have been educated in the past two years.

At ORT Canada's founding convention Avie Bennett presented Montreal MP Sheila Finestone with the Sophie Bennett Award. Kathleen Crook (inset) was installed as national president. [Barry Shainbaum photos]

"A big block of world Jewry live in Russia and the situation is still volatile. A lot of these people want to find a home somewhere and they have found it in our new ORT school.

"Learning is no longer a separate activity. It is a new form of labor and students must learn to be comfortable with new technology. In the future, we see the role of the teacher changing to one of a guide or mentor. The teacher and technology will both be tools the students can utilize. These are the challenges that face World ORT," Isler said.

At the convention's installation and awards luncheon, Rabbi Elyse Goldstein installed Kathleen Crook as the national president.

Nishmat dinner set

By LEILA SPEISMAN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO - A dinner to be held at the home of Julia and Henry Koschitzky on Nov. 18 will raise scholarship funds for Nishmat, The Jerusalem Centre for Advanced Jewish Study for Women.

Chana Henkin, founder and dean of Nishmat will be a special guest, and guest speaker will be Stephen Flatow.

Nishmat, founded in 1990, is modelled on the traditional mens' yeshivah. Henkin's intention was to create a program which would allow university-educated women to pursue Torah studies at the same level of challenge and intensity as they do secular learning.

It accepts students on full-time and part-time bases, and has different programs for the different backgrounds of the students.

Flatow, an attorney from West Orange, N.J., and his wife Roslyn, established Keren Alisa, The Alisa Flatow Scholarship Fund, a scholarship program at Nishmat, to memorialize their daughter, Alisa, who was killed in a terrorist bus bombing in April, 1995. Alisa, a student at Brandeis University, was studying at Nishmat at the time of her death.

The Flatows made a considerable stir in Israel when they agreed to donate several of their daughter's organs, as well as her corneas.

Sometimes the Simplest Things are the Most Special.

Everyone has their own idea of what simple means. To us at The Simple Alternative it means good taste and common sense. Simplicity is one of the hallmarks of Jewish funeral tradition. Expensive caskets and elaborate services are not part of this tradition. And, as many of our families tell us: sometimes the simplest things are the most special.

Best 'show business' requires planning: leaders

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to the CJN

TORONTO — There may be no business like show business, but it's still a business, and like any commodity produced for mass consumption, it requires a marketing strategy, say three entertainment industry leaders.

Paul Godfrey, chair and CEO of Sun Media Corporation; Allen Karp, president and CEO of Cineplex Odeon Corporation; and Phyllis Yaffe, president and CEO of Showcase Television, recently spoke on the business of entertainment, an event organized by the Arts and Entertainment, Financial Services and Young Business Network Divisions of UJA Federation.

Godfrey led the Toronto Sun management group in a successful bid to buy Sun Media Corp. from shareholders and turn it back to the private enterprise the newspaper was when it began 25 years ago. The company operates 10 dailies, 63 weeklies and seven magazines.

The Sun has succeeded where other dailies have failed because it is different and user-friendly and strives to be entertaining, Godfrey said, noting that stories are short without turn pages, and there are large entertainment and sports sections and lots of opinionated columnists. Reader participation is encouraged.

The infamous Sunshine Girl, the Sun's "trademark" also offers entertainment value, he said. "Some people pick up the paper because we have the Sunshine Girl. Others won't read it because we do."

Yaffe, a former librarian from Winnipeg, previously worked in children's television, but next year she'll be launching a new cable channel, since her bid for a Canadian history channel was accepted by the CRTC.

There is a definite audience for Canadian history and drama to be targeted by her advertisers, she said. "I believe Canada has a culture to exploit and be proud of."

CRTC protection

Government funding through Telefilm and other agencies enabled the Canadian television industry to flourish while the CRTC protected it with its Canadian content rulings on both television and radio, she said.

"Without the CRTC, there would be no Canadian television today."

Karp noted that 98 percent of Canadian movie theatres screen non-Canadian films. Cineplex, the second largest theatre chain in North America and the largest in Canada, is committed to creating "an appropriate venue" for Canadian films, even though "other products are more profitable."

There is limited screen time for Canadian films because "Canadians don't support Canadian cinema," he said.

Karp stressed that no one can predict whether a film will become a blockbuster, citing Field of Dreams as an example. After reading the script, he said, he didn't think a story about "a guy who builds a baseball diamond in a cornfield" would have wide appeal, but "it turned out to be one of the biggest films of the decade."

Despite all the changes in technology, the screening of movies has not changed much in 100 years of cinema, Karp said. "Film is still transported in a can."

But theatre designs are changing to become more "people-friendly," he added. Cineplex will be opening 150 new screens in Canada in the next year, he said.

The business of entertainment was sponsored by Gluskin, Sheff & Associates, Goldman Sachs Canada, Gordon Capital Corp., Nesbitt Burns, Scotia McLeod Inc., with creative services from Echo Advertising.

לסיום, כמה שורות שנוגעות חזק, כפי שכתב אותן המשורר נתן יונתן:

"הבית זה מקום שאם אתה חייב לשוב אליו
תמיד פתוחה בו דלת לקראתך,
שיריים הם לפעמים האהבה האחרונה
לבית שרחק".

יש המון שירים על בית, וכולם כמעט מדברים על נעוגעים ועל איך שהיה טוב בבית וכל זה. אבל, לטעמי האישי, נגע נתן יונתן בנקודה הכי חזקה: בית נבחן לא בזה שאתה מתגעגע אליו, אלא בזה שאם אתה צריך אותו - הוא שם בשבילך. הוא שם גם אם ממש לא בא לך לחזור אבל אין לך ברירה, כי אתה חלש, או חולה, או בסוף הדרך. ובהרבה צורות- זה מה שישראל מהווה עבור רבים מאיתנו. תחשבו על זה.

NDP's Kormos calls for Vanunu's release

By RON CSILLAG
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Ontario New Democrat MPP Peter Kormos has joined those calling for the release of Mordechai Vanunu, the one-time technician who blew the whistle on Israel's nuclear installation a decade ago.

Vanunu has suffered "excessive" punishment and should be released from his Israeli prison, says Kormos, who recently returned from a two-day international conference on the case held in Tel Aviv.

Kormos concedes his sentiments probably run counter to mainstream Israeli opinion when it comes to the matter. The MPP says Vanunu tends to be vilified in Israel as a turncoat who damaged his country's nuclear deterrent capabilities.

In 1986, Vanunu was sentened to 18 years in prison for revealing the existence of a nuclear installation in the Israeli desert. From London, he was lured by a female Mossad decoy to Rome, where he was captured and shipped back to Israel for trial.

He's been in solitary confinement for a decade and has restricted access to family — a punishment Kormos calls "torture." Vanunu is eligible for parole in two years.

Vanunu has become a darling of the peace movement and of the left for confirming what many had long suspected about Israel. Several groups, including a small one-in Israel, continue to press for his release.

As part of his recent 12-day trip to Israel, Gaza and the territories, Kormos took part in the controversial conference on Vanunu, chaired by Nobel laureate and peace activist Joseph Rotblat. About 60 people attended, mainly from Britain and North America. Also there was Daniel Ellsberg, the defence analyist who leaked the Pentagon Papers to the media in 1971.

Kormos says he attended the conference because he has "a natural admiration for whistle blowers."

The meeting, which was largely ignored by Israeli media, concluded with a statement calling for Vanunu's release. It was delivered by Rotblat to President Ezer Weizman. Kormos says Weizman was "adamant" that Vanunu deserves his treatment.

Tzedek celebrates Jewish activism in support of rally

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Tzedek, the Jewish campaign for social and economic justice recently held an evening to celebrate Jewish activism and Jewish music.

Speakers Ester Reiter, the coordinator of the women's studies program at Atkinson College of York University; Bess Shockett, a veteran union organizer; and Karen Charnow Lior, a founding member of Tzedek all gave historic and personal perspectives on Jewish activism and labor organizing.

Tzedek's Charnow Lior spoke about the early roots of Jewish activism in Canada, citing the activities of Isaac Matenko, a Russian Jewish secularist — he immigrated to Canada in 1905 — who organized the garment workers' union as a means of increasing literacy among the Jewish working class.

The Radical School, which Metenko founded to promote Yiddish culture was renamed the Peretz School in 1916, Charnow Lior said. "Jewish activism was a combination of cultural struggle, a fortification of the use of Yiddish, theatre, storytelling, dance and music."

She mentioned several Toronto Jewish leaders who were active in the labor movement, including former MPP J.B. Salsberg, Ben Sheck, stage and screen star Lou Jacobi, Pearl Wedro, Molly Fineberg and Leah Stern.

The Montreal-born Shockett, who was involved with the United Jewish People's Order (UJPO), organized workers in Montreal, Toronto and Winnipeg. She recalled that when she began organizing labor in the mid '40s, workers were resistant to the idea of becoming unionized because they were afraid after "they had gone through the hungry '30s."

She stressed that Jewish labor organizers spanned all the trade unions, not just the needle trade, noting that Salsberg had organized both auto and steel workers.

Reiter spoke about camp Naivelt, the summer camp founded by the UJPO 70 years ago. The camp was established by members of the Jewish Women's Labor League, who needed a place to send their children in the summer, she said.

Although other Jewish summer camps existed, the women were reluctant to send their children to camps funded by the charity of their employers, she explained.

Raised in a left-wing home in New York she spent many summers at Kinderland, an American UJPO camp. The camp's emphasis on Yiddish and social justice shaped her values as an adult, she said. "I can't separate my Jewishness from my activism."

The women's speeches were interspersed with musical performances by Batsheva, David Wall, Emma's Triangle, Marcia Beck and Friends, Lisa, and David Buchbinder. The music ranged from feminist folk rock to klezmer and Ladino.

The evening, held at The Bloor Jewish Community Centre, was planned in support of the Days of Action, the recent mass rallies in Toronto protesting the budget cuts of the Ontario Conservative government.

Tzedek founding members say the organization, which has now been in existence for a year, was established, "in the tradition of Jewish activism," as a Jewish response to the policies of the Mike Harris government.

Russian prisoner joins family in Israel

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO – Semyon Livshitz, 37, a Russian Jewish prisoner of conscience adopted by Beth Tzedec synagogue, has finally joined his family in Kiryat Shmonah, Israel, after several harrowing years in a Russian jail.

"You saved the life of our son," Vladilen Livshitz wrote to the synagogue's Soviet Jewry chair Genya Intrator.

Once accused of a plan to hijack a Russian submarine and deliver it to Israel, Livshitz is now living in Kiryat Shmonah with his parents Vladilen and Eva, and his sister, Janna.

The Beth Tzedec committee, and two Canadian MPs, Barry Campbell and Bill Graham, were among those who campaigned over many years to free the former Russian navy officer.

Livshitz was convicted of robbing 11 prostitutes, despite evidence presented to the Russian Sureme Court that he was then in Vladivostok, thousands of miles away from the robbery scene.

A petition with 10,000 names advocating on Livshitz' behalf was collected by Beth Tzedec member Herb Landis.

As a result of protests from B'nai Brith and other human rights groups, and from Andre Ouellet, former Canadian minister of external affairs, and Hart Kaminker, the Russian's Canadian lawyer and Beth Tzedec member, Livshitz' term of 10 years was reduced by four years.

After the reduction of the sentence, Livshitz, in poor health, was sent by prisoner's transport to a penal village in the region of Krasnoyarski in Siberia where the temperature drops to -46 centigrade in winter.

Further appeals on his behalf resulted in Livshitz' being released into the custody of the Israeli Embassy in Moscow. From the embassy, he asked Instrator to convey his gratitude to the people who fought for his release.

Beloved matriach dies at 101

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO – In the 1920s, Goldie Grafstein was one of the first women in Toronto to acquire a driver's licence. In later years, until well into her nineties, she campaigned for grandson Robert Kaplan (former solicitor general of Canada) in every election in which he ran.

The beloved matriarch of a large extended family, Grafstein died recently at Baycrest Hospital, two months shy of her 102nd birthday, while convalescing from a hip replacement operation.

Despite her age and recent surgery, Grafstein's death was unexpected. Even the day before she died, the only indication of something wrong was that Grafstein said she didn't feel like reading the Toronto Star, said daughter Budgie Frieberg.

"For this child she knew about tennis scores; for that one she followed legal education, interest rates, business news; for me there was a continuous debate about Robert Bourassa — was he a patriotic Canadian or not?" said Kaplan in a eulogy.

"Goldie's life was the present and the future. She was completely practical, the complete contemporary," said Kaplan.

Goldina Adelaide Gollom was born Dec. 31, 1894, in London, England. She remembered curtseying before Queen Victoria when the monarch visited her kindergarten class, and hearing that her elders had worried as children about whether Napoleon would invade England.

At age 15, following the death of her mother, she moved to Toronto, where she lived with her grandparents, who had immigrated several years previously, and worked in a coat factory.

Goldie Grafstein had nine children

Polish-born immigrant Moishe Grafstein was smitten with the attractive young blonde from the moment he met her at the dancing school he ran in the evenings. They married in 1914 — she was 19, he was 31.

The Grafsteins had nine children, all of whom played musical instruments. The entire family, including Goldie on accordian, played for local charities, both Jewish and non-Jewish.

Their home was open to a stream of guests including European immigrant relatives and struggling actors who performed at the Jewish theatre around the corner from Moishe's yard goods store on College Street.

About 10 years ago, Goldie, a prolific baker from the time her children were young, wangled a job baking for Just Desserts after telling the owner of the trendy cafe that her banana cakes were much better than theirs.

Widowed in 1968, Grafstein lived on her own until age 99, when she entered Baycrest Hospital. She wrote a book of reminiscences for her family while in her late nineties and at her 100th birthday party, wearing a sequined gown and having prepared a speech weeks in advance, took the microphone to address her 150 guests.

Until her death, she corresponded regularly with at least a dozen family members outside of Toronto.

She leaves two sisters, Rose Wolfe of Reno, Nev., and Mae Zaretsky; daughters Pearl Kaplan, Sarah Solomon, Rose Dolgy, Molly Brown, Rickey Hoff, Tilley Levine of Vancouver, Chippie Feldman of St. Catharines and Budgie Frieberg (Sonny, her only son, died in 1984 of cancer); 24 grandchildren (among them Robert Solomon, assistant dean of the law school at the University of Western Ontario), 41 great-grandchildren and 7 great-great-grandchildren.

Hadassah-WIZO to hold national convention

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO – This weekend some 600 members of Hadassah-WIZO will meet at the Sheraton Centre for the organization's 36th national convention.

The three-day event, held every three years, will kick off on Sunday with a tribute to 11 Women of Achievement: Judge Rosalie Abella, Ontario Court of Appeals; Isabel Bassett, MPP; Judy. Feld Carr, chair, national task force for Syrian Jewry, Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC); Wendy Eisen, chair, Canadian committee for Soviet Jewry, CJC; Sheila Finestone, Liberal MP, Mt. Royal riding, Quebec; Diane Francis, editor, Financial Post, Anne Golden, president, United Way of Greater Toronto; Taylor Hogge, "volunteer extraordinaire" at Hofim; Sheila Kussner, founder of Hope and Cope, a support program for cancer patients and their families; Priscilla de Villiers, president, CAVEAT (Canadians Against Violence Everywhere Advocating its Termination); and Elaine Todres, deputy solicitor general and deputy minister of correctional services, Ontario.

Michal Modai

Keynote speaker for the tribute will be Michal Modai, president, World WIZO. A number of the honorees will speak on panels. Topics will include Social Issues/Women for Women (de Villiers and Todres), Changing Role of Women Affecting Volunteerism (Kussner, Hogge and Feld Carr) and Political and Economic Issues (Finestone, Francis and Bassett).

"They're all wonderful women and I think they will inspire us. The issues, the concerns and the topics affect all of us," said convention chair Pat Alpert, who is to be installed as national president.

Also being honored at the convention are Edgar Bronfman, president of the World Jewish Congress and Madame Justice Claire L'Heureux-Dubé of the Supreme Court of Canada.

Speakers will include former Soviet refusenik Yuli Edelstein, now Israel's minister of immigration and absorption; social psychologist Lauren Woodhouse; Gordon Cressy, president of The Learning Partnership; Bernie Farber, national director, community relations, CJC; and author John Loftus.

Alpert anticipates that the conference will be "stimulating, thought-provoking and...will give people some directions and plans for the future. We really are looking towards the 21st century."

To that end, members will be voting on a number of constitutional amendments. "We want to be sure that we are in today's world, that our amendments reflect today and not 10 years ago," Alpert said.

Hadassah-WIZO Organization of Canada was founded in 1917 to support health, social welfare and educational programs in Israel as well as the enrichment of Jewish life in Canada. With a membership of 17,000 women, Hadassah-WIZO is represented in 43 Canadian communities; in Toronto alone there are 70 chapters. The organization supports Israeli projects such as day care centres, youth clubs and women's clubs as well as Assaf Harofeh Hospital and Hadassah Hospital.

The Canadian organization is affiliated with World WIZO, the Women's International Zionist Organization, with federations in 52 countries on five continents.

Ex-Montrealers gather over bagels, smoked meat

By RON CSILLAG
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO – They came. They reminisced. They ate. Mostly they ate. For as most Torontonians know by now, not only do Montrealers talk the talk when it comes to smoked meat, bagels and pickles, they walk the walk.

At least they did on Nov. 2, when some 500 hungry former Montrealers packed the main gym at the Bathurst Jewish Centre for the Maximum Montreal Reunion held by United Jewish Appeal (UJA).

It may have looked like a Wagar-Chomedey High School intermural sock-hop, or a huge game of Jewish geography, but that didn't stop people from chowing down on Levitt's smoked meat, karnatzel, sours, knishes and bagels (real bagels, not that Toronto bread-shaped-like-a-bagel stuff).

Participants, of course, also caught up with old acquaintances and waxed nostalgic about Crescent Street, Mount Royal, Beaver Lake and the Habs (ahh, the Habs...) Everywhere, people commiserated about Quebec politics and language laws, and swapped stories about who left when and who's still left behind.

Those who came strolled down memory lane to recall their beloved, charming, sophisticated, cosmopolitan and thoroughly maddening Montreal.

The bash was put together by the Montrealers' committee of United Jewish Appeal, as part of UJA's ongoing outreach efforts.

"The purpose is to make Montrealers feel part of Toronto," said program chair Judy Engel (nee Jasnoch), 41, who grew up in Chomedey and moved here 13 years ago.

UJA officials estimate 10,000 to 12,000 former Montrealers now call Toronto home.

"I feel sad [about the move to Toronto] because I really love and miss Montreal. But events in Quebec over the past two years have validated my decision," Lynn Kauffman, a 42-year-old lawyer who left Montreal in 1979, told The CJN.

She and her husband Aubrey, 43, also from Montreal, came to the reunion "because I'll always be a Montrealer at heart. I tell people that I'm from Montreal, but I live in Toronto."

Washington excursion unites young Jews

By ROCHELLE SEGELBAUM
Special to the CJN

TORONTO — Kol Hastudentim (voice of the students) is a council of Jewish students from universities across Ontario. The student-operated organization has been funded through the generosity of Sam and Beverley Cohen and various Jewish organizations. The group is for those who are interested in enriching their lives as members of the Jewish community — on or off campus.

The recent weekend excursion to Washington, D.C., the group's first organized program, brought together participants from 10 universities across Ontario.

The focus of the trip was to meet other students from Ontario and to visit the sites in Washington. Each participant had his/her own reason for attending, and the trip took on an individual meaning for each person.

New province-wide programs are already being planned. Kol Hastudentim hopes to welcome new participants into the group. Together, we hope to use our unified voice to make a difference.

One aspect of the trip was the journey itself. Many hours were spent on and around the bus.

The tour itself included sightseeing in Washington: the display of names project (AIDS memorial quilts), sampling Baltimore's Saturday night cultural scene, shopping in Towsen Town Centre and seeing the Holocaust museum.

"I don't remember who started it, but it seemed the most natural thing to do. There we were, a small group of 20-something-year-olds, sitting on the floor in the middle of the foyer of this enormous museum in Washington, D.C., singing Am Yisroel Chai. Some passers-by stared at us and some people smiled. Some even came and joined us. I listened to the sound of our voices echoing between the hollow walls and cried silently." (Journal excerpt from Oct. 13.)

Through singing or socializing, the shopping experience or the Shabbat experience (the next time I light candles the Baltimore fire department will be notified first), the group came together.

"What was most significant in my mind is that we were able to bring together 28 people of varying religious backgrounds and have them all join together as one and learn from each other as one. That is my basic ideal for the future, the breakdown of all the religious barriers and to be an Am Yisrael again," said Rob Schaumer.

Whether budding engineers, environmentalists, teachers or businesspersons, from the most bold and bubbly to the most intense and introverted, we found that we are really all the same. We share a history and now we will share a future.

Rochelle Segelbaum is a student at York University and Centennial College.

Teen skinheads convicted

WINDSOR — Two 16-year-old skinheads have been convicted of spraypainting racist symbols, including swastikas and SS insignia, on a road and the home of two Holocaust survivors.

The two were placed on probation for 18 months and sentenced to two months of house arrest and 100 hours of community service. They cannot leave their homes unless it is to go to school or in the company of their parents or with permission of their probation officers.

The youths pleaded guilty to three counts each of mischief for spray painting swastikas and the words "burn all Jews" on the side of the house. Assistant Crown Attorney Richard Weatherston said the incident terrorized the elderly owners of the home, the Windsor Observer reported.

Karen Mock, national director of B'nai Brith's League for Human Rights, testified at the trial as an expert on racist symbols and their origin. She said the nature of the symbols indicated the youths had been exposed to white supremacist groups.

Weatherston credited Mock's testimony as persuading Judge Deborah Austin to consider the hate impact of the crime and to increase the sentence.

Kristallnacht marked by Victoria Jews

By MAURICE LUCOW
CJN Western Correspondent

VICTORIA – Kristallnacht was commemorated by Victorians with several events this year.

On Nov. 7, a service was arranged by the Victoria Holocaust Remembrance and Education Society at Congregation Emanu-El. Mayor Bob Cox read a proclamation by City Council declaring the week as Kristallnacht Days – a Week of Remembrance.

Throughout the city, homes and businesses left a candle or a light in a window facing the street, as a token of remembrance.

A huge banner recalling Kristallnacht was placed across Douglas Street, Victoria's main thoroughfare, at the entrance to the downtown area.

On Nov. 3, at Christ Church Cathedral, there was a program of reflection, poetry and storytelling, organized in conjunction with the Catholic diocese of Victoria.

An exhibit of photos of some 1,406 synagogues and prayer houses destroyed by the Nazis on Kristallnacht was on display at the Hillside Shopping Centre.

God's Country, a play by Steven Dietz is being presented at the University of Victoria from Nov. 14 to 30. It's a docudrama about the growing white supremacist movement in North America.

Dietz says it was extensively researched from public records and personal interviews "and is a powerful commentary on the misguided love of country and the lessons of history."

The Victoria Holocaust Remembrance and Education Society "is committed to bringing knowledge of the Holocaust and the message of moral responsibility to the widest possible audience," says Peter Gary, head of the organization. "Our underlying theme is to teach ethical responsibility, to resist hatred and violence with words and deeds, to be critical and self-critical, to build a better world."

Parizeau slammed for public comments

By DAVID LAZARUS
CJN Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Ethnic Quebecers' worst fears about Jacques Parizeau seemed only confirmed when he recently used the referendum anniversary to essentially repeat his chilling "money and the ethnic vote" message of Oct. 30, 1995, Jewish community spokespersons said.

In a lengthy article in Le Devoir marking his first public comments on the Quebec situation since that night, Parizeau again sought to divide the Yes and No vote along linguistic and ethnic lines.

He cited statistics from the referendum results to show that, "The majority of francophone Quebecers want Quebec to become a country.

"They chose their identity and their country."

Parizeau appeared to allude to the Jewish, Greek and Italian federalist coalition by blaming the massive No vote by minorities on "their leaders and associations."

He also called on the Quebec government not to waste time building bridges with anglophones or pandering to their economic fears. He said minorities would eventually learn to "adapt" to sovereignty and that Quebec's economic development no longer depends on the "reactions of a few hundred [anglophone] people living in the Golden Square Mile or Westmount."

Jewish community spokespersons characterized the comments, as they did a year ago, as spiteful, intolerant and as revealing Parizeau in his true colors.

Robert Libman, executive director for the Quebec region of Bnai Brith, characterized Parizeau's analysis as "mean and spiteful."

"It looked like he was trying to rationalize his comments [of a year ago] by presenting it as a statistical analysis, but the underlying sentiment was still there.

"He speaks for one person and for one person only — Jacques Parizeau."

By no coincidence, the coalition used the same issue of Le Devoir to publish an open letter again deploring Parizeau's comments from a year ago.

Large number of Jews in financial need: study

By MAURICE LUCOW
CJN Western Correspondent

VANCOUVER – Demographic studies indicate that as many as 5,000 people in the Jewish community (about 18 percent) may be in financial need, says Mannie Druker, president, of the Hebrew Assistance Association of Vancouver, referring to the organization's just released annual report.

The task of giving aid to those in need is being shifted from government to community organizations such as the Jewish federation and United Way, says Druker.

"Our association," he says, "has never been a beneficiary of either of these agencies and thus we are able to play an independent role in providing financial assistance and advice, without demand on the allocations of these agencies' resources."

The report says a record 116 applications for loans were received this year (compared to 103 last year) and 80 interest-free loans were granted (68 last year). The total value of loans given this year was $214,360 ($187,000 last year).

At the financial year-end, loans receivable totalled $360,784, consisting of 186 loans in all. The incidence of bad debts has been kept to a minimum of $1,000. Two-thirds of all loan applications were approved "and this ratio has not changed much in the years," Druker says.

Membership, at $25 per person, increased in 1996 from 175 to 266 members. A goal of the association is to increase membership to 500 "so future operating expenses are covered entirely by dues, with capital funds being fully available for loans."

The report says operating costs are "modest," as the organization employs only one part-time administrator. Druker says the association is believed to have the lowest "cost to loan" ratio of any similar organization in British Columbia.

"We help those in the community who are unable to borrow from a bank or credit union," Druker says, and the association directs those who may be able to qualify to a small credit union "which has helped a number of our former borrowers."

This association also has a link with VanCity, the largest Canadian credit union. Druker says VanCity has modelled its new Community Loan Fund on the association's operation "and continues to assist us with large donations to various projects and activities."

The Hebrew Assistance Association was created in 1979, as the successor to the Vancouver Free Loan Association, founded in 1915. The annual meeting of the association is set for Nov. 27, at the Jewish Community Centre.

Human rights body launch delayed

By MAURICE LUCOW
CJN Western Correspondent

VICTORIA – The attorney general's department has announced that the amendment to the British Columbia Human Rights Act creating a human rights commission and tribunal will be effective Jan. 1, instead of Nov 1, as scheduled originally.

"The new act is designed to remedy discrimination more effectively, address systematic discrimination and other patterns of inequality and actively promote human rights in the province," Mariann Burka, director of the B.C. Council of Human Rights, told The CJN.

After conducting a nationwide search, the Ministry of the Attorney General has developed a short list of candidates for the positions of chief commissioner of the Human Rights Commission and for the chair of the new Human Rights tribunal. Successful candidates for both positions will be in place before the new year, said Burka.

The name of the existing Human Rights Act will be changed to the Human Rights Code, she said, "to better reflect the quasi-constitutional status and comprehensive nature."

The Human Rights Commission is responsible for informing the public of its rights and responsibilities under the code, and to conduct research in relation to human rights issues. The tribunal is an adjudicative body which will hold hearings and make determinations on discrimination complaints.

It all started with my Polish grandfather who was a master baker in the court of the Russian Czar Nicholas. In 1952 he and my Ukranian grandmother moved to Canada and started future Bakery. They were looking forward to the "Future" in their new country!
Today my father and I run the bakery and we still use my grandparents' recipies.

Jerusalem's Olmert indicted on multiple charges

By RAINE MARCUS
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM – An indictment was issued against Jerusalem Mayor Ehud Olmert in Tel Aviv District Court last Thursday after a High Court decision rejected his appeal not to be charged with fraud offenses pertaining to the 1988 Knesset elections.

Olmert has been indicted on charges of fraud, forgery, breach of trust and other counts arising from the 1988 elections when he was treasurer of the Likud party and was responsible for obtaining donations from businesspeople, companies and other bodies to finance the party's election campaign.

Olmert has been charged with fraudulently issuing false invoices, fraud and breach of trust and deliberately issuing to State Comptroller Miriam Ben-Porat false declarations regarding donations. Others involved in the case were convicted and sentenced recently.

The indictment read that in his capacity as treasurer, Olmert opened a fictitious advertising agency, B.M.Y., and a non-profit organization, Nitzachon Le'Likud, solely for the purpose of listing donations as advertising and consultation fees in order to issue false invoices to donors.

The law of political party financing, forbids a party to receive donations from organizations here or abroad. According to the charges, Olmert used the advertising agency to disguise the fact that money donated to the Likud campaign by such organizations were processed illegally via B.M.Y. and false invoices were issued, stating that sums were paid for advertising fees.

Olmert is also accused of declaring to Ben-Porat that donations to the Likud amounted to around NIS 250,000, when in fact sums processed through B.M.Y. amounted to nearly NIS 1 million.

As a result, following Ben-Porat's report to the Knesset, the Likud received an election campaign budget of over NIS 2 million from the government. According to the indictment, Olmert therefore misled Ben-Porat, the Knesset and the public.

The district attorney has listed some 100 prosecution witnesses who will be summoned to testify against Olmert.

Iran offers to help in search for Arad

By NAOMI SEGAL
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM – Iran's deputy foreign minister has promised that his country would help in locating captured Israeli air navigator Ron Arad.

Speaking in Paris last weekend, the minister said the matter was humanitarian, not political.

Arad's fighter plane was shot down over Lebanon in 1986 and Israeli officials have repeatedly claimed that Iran is holding him.

The promise from the Iranian deputy foreign minister Mahmoud Waize came against the backdrop of talks he held in France on an economic deal that included the purchase from France of 10 Airbus planes, a $500-million purchase of communications satellites and cooperation in the area of oil production.

Israeli observers said the promise to help locate Arad was a precondition for the economic deal Iran concluded with France.

But commentator Aluf Ben wrote in the Israeli daily Ha'aretz that the promise of help might have resulted from changes in the Israeli-Iranian relationship since the election of Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu.

Ben wrote that Israel had toned down its criticism of Tehran since the election.

Former prime ministers Yitzhak Rabin and Shimon Peres had frequently referred to Iran as the primary threat to Israel in the Middle East.

Levy tries to defuse tensions

By NAOMI SEGAL
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM – Foreign Minister David Levy travelled to Cairo last week in an effort to defuse recent Israeli-Egyptian tensions.

Despite the recent critical statements emanating from Cairo about the pace of the peace process, Levy described his meetings with Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak and Foreign Minister Amre Moussa as positive.

"Relations between Egypt and Israel are very important and peace between the two states can be a model for the rest of the parties," Levy said at a joint news conference with Moussa, adding that the two sides had discussed ways to push the peace process forward.

Moussa, for his part, had an implied criticism of the Israeli stance in the ongoing negotiations with the Palestinians about implementing a turnover of most of Hebron to self-rule.

Peace "has to be balanced between the Israelis and the Palestinians, not to be imposed but to be agreed upon," he said.

"Balance, agreement and fairness were the points stressed by the president," Moussa said, describing the talks between Levy and Mubarak.

The talks between Israel and the Palestinians have been held up over disagreements on the security aspects of a long-delayed Israeli troop redeployment from Hebron.

Each side has blamed the other for stalling on the agreement.

Levy's visit was just days before the scheduled opening in Cairo of the third annual Middle East-North African regional economic summit.

Officers are supposed to request permission to meet with non-military personnel, but casual meetings between politicians and top military figures have become routine in Israel. However, as chief negotiator, Shahor was in an especially sensitive position.

Right-wing critics say Shahor should have been fired from the army, while left-wing critics accused the government of acting like a "paranoid dictator."

"Shahor should have been reprimanded," says Maoz. "But to suspend him was a very severe message to the military echelon. It not only failed to thaw the ice but hardened it."

The incident was the latest in a series of crises between the security establishment and government that have led to growing mistrust. Likud MK Uzi Landau, who heads the Knesset's powerful Foreign Affairs and Defence Committee, sparked an outcry recently when he accused the IDF General Staff of sporting a left-wing bias. Landau said the military had been "tainted" by its involvement in negotiations with the Palestinians under the Labor government and implied that it could no longer be counted on for objective assessments.

"This is a different type of crisis than anything we have ever seen before," said Maoz. "There have been many disagreements between the Israeli military and government in the past, but they were based on differences of substance. I don't remember a situation in which the political echelon accused the entire military of serving the opposition. There is a danger that this could lead to a self-fulfilling prophecy," he warned.

"The Shahor affair has intensified the crisis and further eroded trust between the political and military echelons," he added. "The General Staff is fearful and the political echelon even more suspicious than before."

In an interview with the Hebrew daily Ha'Aretz earlier this month, Maoz even posited the possibility of a military coup.

"I don't see tanks surrounding the Prime Minister's office," he said. "But I could see the military presenting the government with an ultimatum demanding a change in policy. It's a remote possibility, but not impossible under certain circumstances."

One such scenario is a right-wing government that leads Israel into a violent confrontation with the Arab world — a confrontation which is opposed by half the population, he said.

"The IDF would feel itself obliged to carry out government policy, but would find it difficult to do so because of a drastic decline in motivation and widespread draft-dodging. In such a situation, the army might present the prime minister with an ultimatum to change its policy."

Maoz admits that such a scenario is not around the corner. But he says the rift between the government and defence establishment has already extracted a very real price.

"The flare-up in the territories in September was a direct result of the refusal of the political echelon to accept the assessment of the military," he charges. "Security experts warned of a pressure cooker building up in the territories in the absence of negotiations. The violence could have been avoided had the government heeded that advice."

Maoz adds that this is the first time a government has rejected military assessments on the grounds that they are believed to be politically-motivated. "That's a new rule in the game and a very dangerous one. There is a sense that military experts are not being credited with professional judgment."

The fallout from the Shahor affair could include a series of mass firings or mass resignations in the army within the next few months, he said.

FTA goes to Senate

She told The CJN the deal "isn't that controversial. If we can trade with China, we can have free trade with Israel."

Prior to the bill's passage, Reform MP Keith Martin introduced a motion calling for deferring implementation of the deal as a way of "expressing displeasure" with the pace of the Netanyahu government's peace plans.

"It was intended to illustrate our wish for Mr. Netanyahu to take an approach more in line with Mr. Rabin and Mr. [Shimon] Peres, and with the Oslo accords. It was a clear statement that [Netanyahu's] policies are not looked upon favorably by Reform," Martin told The CJN.

The motion "was in no way against Israel but [a reflection] that we are extremely disturbed by events [that have taken place] since last May."

Martin said his motion had the support of his party. But it was defeated by the Liberal majority in the House, and moments later, it was Reform party whip Chuck Strahl who introduced the motion calling for the passage of Bill C-61.

The bill passed "on division," meaning there was no vote taken and that while some MPs had reservations, they weren't serious enough to delay passage.

Soldiers wounded in security zone

By DAVID RUDGE
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM – Three soldiers were wounded last Sunday – one seriously and two lightly – when their tank was hit by a Sagger missile in the same area of the security zone where a similar incident occurred last Saturday, in which Sgt. Erez Yitzhak was killed and three members of his tank crew were hurt.

Yitzhak, 19, was buried Sunday afternoon in the military cemetery of his hometown, Netanya. Hundreds of people attended the funeral.

While the service was taking place in Netanya, doctors and nurses at Haifa's Rambam Hospital and the Nahariya Government Hospital continued treating the injured. Rambam Hospital deputy director Dr. Zvi Ben-Ishai said that the soldier wounded in the neck in Saturday's attack was still in serious condition and was in the intensive care unit of the neurosurgery department.

The second soldier wounded in Saturday's attack is being treated in the Nahariya hospital for light-to-moderate injuries. The third soldier was very lightly injured in the attack and received treatment in the field.

Ben-Ishai said Cpl. Yishai Ben-Eli, of Jerusalem, who was wounded Sunday, underwent prolonged surgery Sunday and was afterwards expected to be transferred to the orthopedic department. Ben-Ishai said his condition was serious, but stable.

The two other soldiers hurt in yesterday's incident - Lt. Barak Ronen, of Haifa, and Cpl. David Fahima, of Ashdod - both suffered light wounds. Fahima, despite suffering from smoke inhalation, managed to rescue Ben-Eli from the damaged tank.

President Ezer Weizman visited the wounded in Rambam and Nahariya hospitals Sunday.

Hezbollah claimed responsibility for both attacks in a statement saying that the attacks were launched to mark memorial day for all the "martyrs" of the Islamic Resistance, Hezbollah's fighting arm.

IDF and South Lebanese Army gunners pounded Hezbollah targets in the Jabal Batzil region, in south Lebanon's western sector, where the shooting originated. Reports from Lebanon said virtually all 400 residents of Yatar, north of the zone, fled their homes. There were no reports of any civilian casualties.

A number of the small villages in the area, including Yatar and Kafra, are known to be Hezbollah strongholds. IDF and SLA gunners did not fire into the villages to avoid harming civilians.

Later, in the afternoon, IAF planes struck another Hezbollah stronghold - the Jabal Saffi region, in the eastern sector of south Lebanon.

The IDF spokesperson said the pilots reported accurate hits and all the planes returned safely to their bases.

Yesterday's incident occurred early in the morning while troops backed by armored vehicles were searching the area for the Hezbollah squads that carried out the attacks the previous day. Two Hezbollah squads were involved in Saturday's incident. One of the units approached within relatively close range of the Karkum post and opened fire with mortars and light weapons. A tank positioned alongside the outpost pulled out of the compound to return fire and was hit by a Sagger missile fired by the second squad from about three kilometres away.

Yitzhak was killed in the attack and his three comrades were wounded, including the tank commander who was blown out of the vehicle. He returned to the blazing tank, however, and directed operations to get it out of the line of fire and back to the position.

Troops were conducting searches in the Jabal Batzil area, not far from the Karkum position, when they came under mortar fire. At the same time, a Sagger missile scored a direct hit on the tank supporting the soldiers, wounding three members of its crew.

Both of the tanks that were hit were of the updated and reinforced Patton type, which are still in service in south Lebanon, though the more modern Merkava is considered to give better protection against anti-tank missiles.

U.S. Conservative rabbi wants to convert non-Jews

By TOM TUGEND
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

LOS ANGELES – A leading Conservative rabbi has challenged American Jews to embark on a mission to convert unaffiliated Christians to Judaism.

The time has come, says Rabbi Harold Schulweis, for Jews to emulate the missionary practice of their ancient forebearers through "a national or international Jewish movement to educate, invite and embrace non-Jews into the fold."

The message is not new. Alexander Schindler, president emeritus of the Reform movement, advocated three years ago to offer Judaism to unchurched Christians.

But the stature of the new messenger has engendered renewed debate among Jewish and Christian theologians.

It also comes amid controversy over a Southern Baptist Convention resolution encouraging evangelizing of Jews.

Rabbi Schulweis cited the attraction of Judaism as a world religion, its ancient tradition of proselytizing and the argument that conversion of non-Jewish spouses in mixed marriages is the surest guarantor of producing children and grandchildren with strong Jewish identities.

Many non-Jews "hunger for an authentic, moving and relevant faith," Rabbi Schulweis said.

Orthodox and Conservative rabbis took issue with Rabbi Schulweis, saying that the Jews must first focus on the indifferent and unaffiliated in their own ranks before trying to attract non-Jews.

Rabbi Nachum Sauer, head of graduate Judaic studies at the Yeshiva of Los Angeles, said Jewish law requires that would-be converts be discouraged and "pushed away," rather than courted.

Conservative Rabbi William Lebeau, dean of the Rabbinical School of the Jewish Theological Seminary in New York, termed an active conversion outreach a complicated issue, widely discussed in Conservative circles.

Rabbi Lebeau said most Conservative leaders would favor meeting the religious and spiritual needs within the Jewish community first.

Rabbi Schulweis says the concept of Judaism as a missionary faith is deeply rooted in Jewish tradition and theology.

The prophet Isaiah declared that God had "created and appointed you a covenant people, a light for the nations," and the Talmud states that "God exiled the Jews from their homeland for one reason: to increase the number of converts," he said.

Jews were extremely active and successful proselytizers throughout the Roman Empire, until such activities were made a capital crime and forcibly suppressed when Christianity became the state religion.

Among those supporting Rabbi Schulweis is Rabbi David Wolpe, assistant to the chancellor of the Jewish Theological Seminary.

"As the originators of monotheism, we have a lot to say to the world," said Rabbi Wolpe, whose latest book appropriately bears the title, Why Be Jewish?

"People increasingly see [conversionary outreach] as a worthy mission, especially when you see how much thoughtfulness and devotion has been brought to Judaism by those who have converted," he added.

Addressing the "lack of resources" argument, Rabbi Wolpe said, "The more you expand the Jewish base, the more you expand the resources."

Conversions may have the biggest impact in mixed marriages. When a non-Jewish spouse does not convert, the couple's children are almost sure to marry non-Jews, assuring assimilation in a couple of generations, according to surveys.

In contrast, when the gentile spouse converts, those marriages score higher in almost every aspect of Jewish identity and religious practice than couples made up of two people who were born Jews, says Rabbi Schulweis.

But Steven Bayme, director of the American Jewish Committee's Jewish communal affairs department, says he doubts that conversionary outreach will have any effect on communal demographics.

Only one of every 14 non-Jews in mixed marriages becomes a convert, said Bayme.

One reason for this phenomenon, he said, may be that mixed marriages, with both spouses retaining their original religions, are now so common and accepted that there is no pressure on either side to convert.

Rabbi Schulweis warns against seeking converts for the sake of replacing demographic losses.

"Those who come to us must not be seen as surrogates of our Holocaustal losses or as replacements for those who have left us. They must not be used as means to ends, but as ends in themselves," Rabbi Schulweis says.

He is not too sanguine that this advice will be heeded.

Chirac reassures French Jews

BY LEE YANOWITCH
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

PARIS – French Jewish leaders emerged from a meeting with President Jacques Chirac with reassurances that Franco-Israeli relations were on a positive track.

The leaders requested last week's meeting to voice their concerns that Chirac's Middle East tour in late October had created a chill between France and Israel.

Chirac, who took a pro-Arab stance during his trip, called for the creation of a Palestinian state and said that Israel should return the Golan Heights to Syria, positions that have been rejected by Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu.

The trip upset French Jews, who feared a repeat of the tense period in Franco-Israeli relations after President Charles de Gaulle imposed an anti-Israeli embargo after the 1967 Six Day War.

Jean Kahn, president of the Consisitoire, which tends to the religious needs of French Jews, quoted Chirac as telling the Jewish officials that he considered Netanyahu a "true personal friend."

Kahn said the French leader pledged that his "friendship for Israel would continue to exist."

Organ transplants considered a mitzvah

'Pikuach nefesh takes precedence'

By LEILA SPEISMAN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO – Contrary to what many Jews believe, organ transplants are not just permitted according to Jewish law, but are considered a mitzvah.

The controversy arises, explained Rabbi Howard Sacknowitz and Dr. Bernard Goldman, with the rabbinical definition of death.

Rabbi Sacknowitz, guidance counsellor at CHAT and a frequent speaker on the subject of transplants, and Goldman, chief of cardiac surgery at Sunnybrook Health Science Centre, were speaking to a public health forum organized by Baycrest Centre's Women's Auxiliary.

While all accept the notion of brain death, there is controversy about whether that constitutes complete cessation of brain activity, which means that body functions are completely shut down as well, or brain stem death, in which, they explained, respiration continues.

The difference is that in the first situation, the organs will be too damaged to be used for transplantation.

Rabbi Sacknowitz explained that while Jews are not permitted to mutilate a dead body, to derive benefit from it, or to refrain from burying the whole body, the rabbis have decided that the mitzvah of pikuach nefesh, saving a life, takes precedence over all three injunctions.

While donor cards are considered acceptable religiously, the rabbi said, care should be taken to involve a rabbi, since there are halachic aspects to how organs should be removed.

"The Halachah has not changed," Rabbi Sacknowitz insisted. "It is just that medicine has developed the technology and knowledge to save lives. That is what has changed."

"During the 1970s," Goldman said, "patients receiving heart transplants didn't do so well, and so fewer and fewer were done."

Then, in 1980, cyclosporine, a drug originally developed as an anti-fungal agent, was found to be effective in preventing organ rejection.

"Now, we are the victim of our success," Goldman said, noting that, for instance, there can be a five-year waiting list for heart transplants.

There are many ethical issues involved in transplants, Goldman said. "With greater success because of better matching, surgery and preservation techniques, the resources needed increase tremendously and money is diverted from less dramatic causes, such as drug education and highway safety.

Loma Linda Medical Centre in the United States was using organs from babies born without brains, he said, "but there was such an outcry, that that line of research was stopped."

Similarly, Goldman said, fetal tissue appears to be helpful in treating Parkinson's disease – but that comes from aborted fetuses.

There are other ethical issues surrounding transplants, he said, citing as examples protecting unwilling family members from undue pressure to donate organs, and deciding who gets priority for this treatment at a time of fiscal restraint.

During an emotional question period, several people who are waiting for transplants urged members of the audience to sign donor cards and urged rabbis to give sermons encouraging this practice.

Solly Fox, who received a heart transplant 14 months ago, told of his experiences while waiting for the transplant, and the relief at being able to breathe easily after it was done.

The evening was moderated by Rabbi Nachum Berlat, director of pastoral care at Baycrest.

Drug shows promising results

NEW YORK — The new drug Doxil, approved earlier this year for the treatment of Kaposi Sarcoma for AIDS patients, is showing promising results for other cancers.

"We've had 20 to 25 percent response rates in advanced carcinoma patients that haven't responded to other treatments," says Dr. Linda Paradiso, senior director of clinical research for Sequus Pharmaceutical Inc. "We have also had good results in breast, prostate, lung, sarcoma and endometrial cancers."

Unlike standard forms of chemotherapy, Doxil leaves healthy tissue unscathed and saves its powerful cell-killing punch for cancer tissue.

What's New for Winter

The color purple says winter in the city. A multitude of shades for your eyes, lips and cheeks. It's exciting, fun and there is something for everyone.

Blend soft shades of mauve on your eyelids, dust a hint of purple blush on your cheeks and color your lips with the softest shade of mauve or the most vivid shade of violet. Have fun and step into a fashion-forward mode.

Keeping your skin looking soft and radiant can be a difficult task during the winter months. Cold winds and heating vents definitely play havoc with the texture and color tone of your skin. Its important to replace the lost moisture by treating yourself to a treatment cream at least once a week and use a nourishing day, night and eye cream daily. Don't forget about your lips. Dry cracked lips can be uncomfortable and unsightly.

Carol's Tips

Skin care is clearly more time consuming during the winter months, but, certainly worth the effort. A skin analysis will help you choose the right cleansing and moisturizing creams for your individual skin type.

Treat your skin with Lift Serum Extreme from Chanel, this breakthrough formula has been designed to improve the density of your skin and correct and smooth the appearance of all wrinkles, however deep. This fabulous cream is packaged in an "airless" bottle that delivers a pre-measured dosage that is perfect every time.

Vichy brings us Thermal S1 (a light cream for normal to dry skin) and Thermal S2 (a rich cream for very dry skin). Both these creams contain thermal spa water which is an active form of water that has a soothing effect and a unique power to revive enzyme activity. It enables the skin to regain its own hydration cycle while becoming soft, supple and radiant.

Lancome's Primordiale Yeux, Visibly Revitalizing Eye Treatment, is a luxurious creme-gel that insulates the fragile eye area from premature aging factors. The spectacular results are credited to the original active ingredient transport system: the Nanocapsule containing pure vitamin E.

Foundation literally smoothes out your skin tones, making it look soft and silky while protecting it from the environment. Be sure to use cover-creme under your eyes to camouflage dark circles. This season full coverage or simply sheer is your choice, both are current.

Clinique brings us New City Base that is good for any skin type, even oily skin during the winter months. It is an oil free, soft matte, creme-to-powder foundation, designed for extra long-wearing with an SPF 15 for sunscreen protection. Available at all counters January 1997.

Excellent coverage can be obtained with Derma Blend concealer and compact cover creme. These products are waterproof, non-greasy and easy to apply. Dust your face with Derma Blend setting powder for a long lasting effect.

Blush this winter is refined and elegant. Dust colors of plum, violet or soft mauve high on your cheekbones to give you an added lift.

Chanel brings us the perfect travel brush collection. It includes four all-natural hair brushes for all your needs. The brushes are enveloped in a gorgeous black quilted casing that is small enough to fit in almost any purse.

Estee Lauder gently colors cheeks with the lightest sweep in three new colors: Violette Dream, Tawny Desire or Port Passion.

Eyes are colorful with every shade of purple. There is a plethora of shades available, from purple popsicle to the softest lilac. If purple tones are just not for you, browns still work. Choose rich hues of coffee and taupe. Colors that work are deep and bold. Enhance your eyes with soft kohl pencils. Smudge for a smoky effect.

Clinique's new Shadowliner is easy to apply and has its own blending nib to give you a soft, sultry look. It comes in six fabulous new shades.

The Purple Reigns palette from Estee Lauder offers four gorgeous new eye shadows ranging from subtle beige neutrals, to smoky, sexy heathers.

Lips are intense and creamy looking. Colors are warm and natural. Shades range from soft mauve to deep hues of wine and plum. Browns are still great, for a twist, outline your lips with a plum pencil and use a brown lipstick and visa-versa. For best mouth effects keep your lips moist and soft. Use a lip treatment daily.

If your lips are really weather burned, try Elizabeth Arden's Eight Hour Cream. This cream will help heal any mild irritation and can be used on your face, lips or hands.

Lipstick feathering is no laughing matter. LipZone Anti-Feathering Complex, from Estee Lauder, not only diminishes the appearance of lines around the mouth, but, acts a barrier around the lips to stop feathering instantly.

Hair this season is slim, sleek and shiny, says hair designer Daniel Fiorio. Winter months seem to be the most stressful time of the year. Fiorio says many women complain about hair loss and lack of shine and lustre. He believes this is due to stress. The designer suggests deep breathing and setting aside at least 15 minutes a day for relaxation.

Lundstrom designs by inspiration

By CAROL WISE
Special to The CJN

Designer Linda Lundstrom has long been considered a master of classic yet comfortable styling.

"For years I've been telling women why wait until you get home to put on your comfortable clothes when you can wear them all day long," she explains.

Lundstrom's collections have always offered a wide range of comfortable, casual styles that are suitable for the workplace. She also incorporates a patented instant alteration feature in her clothing and uses machine washable fabrics. Her knitwear is made of a special yarn called piltrol which resists pilling.

I recently spoke to Lundstrom about her unique fashion ideas.

Q. Your stores are known as "one stop shopping," how so?

A. Our stores are fully stocked with a family of products that will answer your every need — and even your every whim. As a busy career woman, wife and mother of two, I certainly do not have the time to shop. I'd much rather spend my personal time with my family. I know I'm not alone in this way of thinking so we've put it all in one place and called it "one-stop shopping."

Q. How do you see fashion in the workplace changing?

A. Women are finding out that they don't need to dress like men to be taken seriously. Women have a lot to celebrate, a lot to express and one of the easiest ways to do this is to make a lasting impression. Clothing should represent your individual choice, confidence in your convictions and pride in who you are.

Q. What inspired you to design your signature "La Parka" coat?

A. "Inspired is exactly the right word because that's exactly what La Parka is — an inspiration. About 10 years ago I had a vision, I know this might sound a bit ec-

The tie: is it useless or a signature accessory?

By PHYLLIS FELDMAN
Special to the CJN

At a recent dinner party, I was introduced to someone who had been described as an intelligent, assertive, "with-it" type of guy – the promising newest addition to my friend's law practice.

After the introductions were made, my eyes became locked with those of Bugs Bunny somewhere in the middle of this man's chest. Now I'm quite sure my attention was diverted for a mere few seconds, but by the time I looked up to see this man's face, I had already put him on the liability side of my balance sheet.

Sometimes referred to as "that useless piece of material" around a man's neck, a tie is often a man's signature piece of clothing, the one with which he can express his individuality in his otherwise routine professional dress.

Tie choices tell us where a man places himself socially, in business and politically – even if he wishes to be noticed or simply to blend in with the crowd. Carefully chosen neckwear is, therefore, important in creating a first impression. In this case, Bugs was screaming: "Fashion faux pas, Doc!" And I heard it loud and clear.

Ties have the ability to cordon off certain men into the VIP (very impressively picked) neckwear group or keep them bound together indefinitely in the purgatory of "the tastefully challenged."

As well as tasteful and interesting, ties should be in balance with a man's build. Large men need boldness in pattern, knot and tie width. Slightly built men should avoid exceptionally large patterns, but not be intimated into the mini-stripes or solids routine. My favorites are endangered species, unusual scenes and interesting faces. I think these look great on just about everyone.

Silk ties seem to hold their shape best. Try to avoid wide gaps between the tie knot and the apex of the shirt collar, which can give the impression of novice, not to be confused with the intentional "I loosened my tie" look, which I, personally, find very appealing.

What do women generally think about ties? Are they euphemistically used as symbols of masculinity — another way for men to publicly strut their stuff? Well, what can I say, except when I see one hanging just right, firmly knotted and slightly arched — I definitely take a second look.

Tying One On...

1. Unless you are a pediatrician or children's performer, avoid wearing cartoon characters or superheroes around your neck. (You just might attract the underage crowd.)

2. Make a statement — tie a thicker knot. This involves a series of strategic manoeuvres; the technique is best acquired by attending a demonstration at your local men's clothier.

3. Never wear pre-matched tie and handkerchief sets; it looks like your mother dressed you...Unless, of course, I happen to be your mother!

centric, but I actually saw a silhouette walking across a horizon, a flowing garment in soft, pastel color that picked up the hues of the sunset. From that first moment I envisioned the coat in my mind.

Q. What about travel, do you have any special tips?

A. I start by bringing only one carry-on suitcase. I design a line called "Sun Goddess Gear" that is perfect for this type of packing because the fabrics, such as voile, are completely crushable, lightweight and will not wrinkle. I roll all my garments up (leaving them on the hangers) and when I arrive I just have to hang them up.

Q. How does a woman who doesn't have a perfect figure choose a dress?

A. Ah, the perfect figure dilemma! First of all, who defines the perfect figure? Probably the same guy who designed six-inch stiletto heels! I feel strongly that real women have real curves. Period. So, working within this definition, I set out to design clothing that women of all sizes can enjoy. Our sizes range from a petite 3L or from size 2 to 24.

Theresa Tova musical a masterful work of art

By SIDURA LUDWIG
Special to the CJN

TORONTO — The musical Still the Night is not just a Holocaust story. It is a story about the strength of women's relationships.

Starring Theresa Tova and Liza Balkan, the play follows the lives of two Jewish girls from their prepubescent years in World War II Poland to their lives roughly 20 years later in Canada and Israel.

Tova, who also wrote the script, opens the play as Bryna, a cynical middle-aged survivor and mother of a young woman, Tybele, also played by Tova. The actor bounces back and forth between two characters and accents with such ease that there seem to be two separate characters on the stage.

The story of Bryna's wartime struggle unfolds through her memories and flashbacks, and Tova gives further evidence of her talent by also playing Bryna as a young girl in the war.

Balkan plays Little Bryna, Bryna's cousin named after the same grandmother. During the war, the two girls had hidden and run away together and the dynamics between the aggressive Bryna and passive Little Bryna are real. Both Balkan and Tova successfully convey the tenderness and impatience the characters feel for one another.

Advertised as a music play, Still the Night features traditional Yiddish folk songs, American theatre tunes and original works written by Tova and John Alcorn. Tova and Balkan have rich voices, which convey both the melancholy tones of the lullabies and the more jazzy, upbeat theatre numbers. They use simple harmonies, letting the music and the words carry the emotions of the songs.

Tova and Balkan are accompanied by a trio of violin, piano and percussion, played by Anne Lederman, David Restivo and David Tomlinson respectively. The music, while subtle, complements the actors' emotions.

The multilevel stage, set like a jungle gym with ladders and box-like compartments, proves practical for presenting the many different settings the girls found themselves in during the war.

Theresa Tova (left) and Liza Balkan star in Still the Night.

While at times confusing because of the constant switch in time frame, the play succeeds as a survivior's story being passed down from generation to generation.

The scenes between Bryna and her daughter are at times hilarious, at times heart wrenching, as Tybele struggles to understand her mother's pain. Their relationship is dynamic and Tybele's patience is endearing as she unconditionally cares for her mother.

But the heart of the play lies in the relationship between Bryna and Little Bryna. Tova and Balkan have a chemistry like the one often found in adolescent sisters.

Forced to grow up before their time, the two characters handle their trauma within the limits of their youthful ignorance. The complexities of the Holocaust are brought to a basic level that clearly shows the devastating effect of loss of childhood.

This play's strength lies in its ability to have sentiment without being sentimental. Tova has produced a masterful piece of art, managing to tell a wealth of stories in just two hours. She has preserved the belief in human strength and the importance of care during all times of struggle.

Still the Night continues at Théâtre Passe Muraille through to Nov. 24.

Peace offers opportunities

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO – The Middle East peace process, in spite of and even because of attendant difficulties, still offers prime opportunities for Canadian businesses, according to a panel of four Israeli experts on business and industry.

With the approach of the scheduled implementation date of the Canada-Israel Free Trade Agreement (Jan. 1, 1997), new opportunities for international joint ventures are opening, said Yael Varsano-Barzilay, Israel's consul for economic affairs to Canada, at a recent media roundtable panel on Israeli business and industry hosted by the Israel Economic Mission to Canada at the Four Seasons Hotel.

Varsano-Barzilay chaired the session, which featured speakers Dan Propper, president of the Manufacturers' Association of Israel and managing director and CEO of the Osem Group of Companies; Dan Gillerman, chair of the Federation of Israeli Chambers of Commerce; Joseph Vardi, special adviser to Israel's minister of foreign affairs and minster of finance for the peace process and regional economic development; and Raffi Sadeh, vice-president of the Israeli Hotel Association.

The four panelists had been brought in by State of Israel Bonds to speak at another panel the previous day.

"There is a very major role to be played by foreign companies, not only because financially or technology-wise we cannot do it on our own, but because of the animosity, suspicions and hatred that have been part of our coexistence for so many years. I think most projects will not be bilateral and will need a foreign or international sponsor or facilitator," said Gillerman.

"For a project to be viable, it should be led, facilitated and packaged by an international company. That's where Canadian companies with expertise can become the major shareholders and the leaders in many of these projects. You'll be part of making peace in a volatile area and at the same time making money."

Vardi encouraged Canadians to invest, not only in Israel, but also in Jordan, Egypt and the Palestinian Authority because "peace-seeking people in these countries are entitled to see that peace carries dividends and that the Western world is interested in what's going on."

Cooperation within the Middle East, combining Israel's technical know-how with the employment needs of neighboring countries, could help "cement the peace process," Propper said.

"You need vision to see the fruit of peace. The first ones to be there will be the best ones to enjoy it."

There will be a real need for foreign investment to fund $50 billion (US) worth of projects, both local and regional, in areas such as tourism and telecommunications, over the next decade, said Gillerman.

Tourism has almost doubled in the last decade, from 1.4 million visitors in 1985 to 2.5 million in 1995, noted Sadeh. Although there was a decline earlier this year, the situation is stabilizing now, he said.

Tourism is expected to grow at a yearly rate of 10 percent until the year 2000, and another 5 percent a year until 2010, he added, noting that the projections are considered "realistic" rather than optimistic.

Plans are in the works for 10,000 new hotel rooms in Jerusalem, 1,500 in Tel Aviv, and 3,000 in Eilat over the next few years, he said.

A widespread privatization plan for 1997 will affect the Israeli banking, airline and telecommunications industries, among others, Gillerman noted.

Among the major Canadian

Peace talks open the door for investments

companies already involved in Israel are Newbridge of Canada, which together with Tadiran Telecom has been awarded a tender by Bezeq; Northern Telecom, which purchased 20 percent of Telrad's shares for $45 million US; and the Canada Highway International Corporation, which is bidding for the first portion of a cross-Israel highway, said Varsano-Barzilay.

Israel's GDP of close to $90 billion US exceeds that of all neighboring countries put together, said Propper. The country's growth in both private consumption and industrial exports in recent years is due to the peace process, which opened doors to the Far East, as well as massive immigration from the former Soviet Union, he added.

Despite the influx, unemployment fell to 6.5 percent after an initial rise, Propper said.

Although the country has a relatively small population, Gillerman said it is a large market because of its dearth of natural resources.

Important industries in Israel today include the computer field and the chemical industry, as well as the more traditional food and clothing industries, Propper said.

St. John's Brand hopes for call up to NHL

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Aaron Brand grew up in Toronto watching Maple Leafs hockey on TV, so it shouldn't come as much of a surprise that in addition to being a Leafs fan, he's adopted many of the codewords and cliches of today's young hockey player.

"I just have to prove myself in St. John's, play good and put up some good stats," he said in a telephone interview from his new home in Newfoundland. "You never know if you'll get a call back."

At 21, Brand is optimistic that he'll impress the Maple Leafs, parent club of the American League's St. John's Maple Leafs, and get a call up to the NHL.

If he does, it could be historic — at least as far as Jewish athletes are concerned. It will probably mark the first time ever that two Jewish skaters have laced 'em up for the Maple Leafs — perhaps the first time ever that one NHL team had two Jews on the roster.

Although Brand is conscious of his Jewish heritage and he admires Leafs' defenceman Mathieu Schneider for his open pride in being Jewish, his concerns right now are more immediate — scoring goals, setting up plays and impressing the Leafs' brass.

Leafs management believes Brand has what it takes to make it to the big league, and they're willing to give him two years to prove them right. Assistant general manager Bill Watters says Brand has that length of time to show he can step it up to the next level. If not, at the tender age of 23, he'll likely be cast adrift as the Buds try to develop other prospects.

But so far, Watters likes what he sees. "Aaron's played particularly well in four of the last five games," he said recently. "He's come on and we're pleased. He's got to continue his learning curve."

The Leafs value Brand's offensive creativity, his work ethic, his ability to take faceoffs and his versatility in being able to play centre or wing, Watters said. "He's a talented hockey player" who should continue to develop if he get lots of ice time, he added.

Last year at 20, an age when many junior players have already been selected by NHL clubs, Brand was undrafted and unsigned. As an overage junior, he attracted the notice of Leafs' scouts thanks to the impressive numbers he put up in the Ontario Hockey League.

Playing for the Sarnia Sting, the six-foot, 190-lb. centre led the league in scoring with 46 goals and 73 assists in 66 games. Midway through the season, he was joined by David Nemirovsky, a Florida prospect who played nine games in the NHL last season before being returned to junior.

The two used to kibbitz about their Jewish backgrounds, aware of how rare it was for two Jewish Torontonians to play on the same major junior hockey club.

Although their paths have diverged, both are now one step below the NHL. Nemirovsky is playing for the Panthers' affiliate, the Carolina Monarchs. (His brother, Mikhail, is playing for the IHL's Fort Wayne Komets after spending last year with Flint Generals of the Colonial Hockey League.)

After being signed last March as a free agent, Brand admits he was "ecstatic." As a Toronto native, the possibility of playing for the Leafs "was a dream come true."

Brand participated in the team's main training camp "so I got to play with Wendel [Clark], [Matts] Sundin and Dougie [Gilmour]. I got the chance to compare myself to the big boys."

Playing on one of four teams in an intrasquad training camp tournament, Brand averaged about one point per game. He also played in games versus other teams' rookies.

When he was sent down to St. John's, he resolved to improve his game and get himself noticed. Although the lines get juggled, early in the season he was teamed with Jason Cipolla and Shayne Toporowski. In five games, he scored two goals and added two assists.

In addition to adjusting to professional hockey, Brand's had to make other adjustments as well. In junior, he was billetted with a family in Sarnia but on "The Rock," he's living with teammates Doug Bonner (a goalie) and defenceman Yannick Tremblay. "Yannick's out best cooker," Brand says, though it's more likely he'll get called up by the Leafs than by Bistro 990.

When he's not helping clean up the house, Brand is at the rink for five hours a day, practising and working out.

His parents are behind him 100 percent as he pursues his dream of an NHL career. Although both his parents are American-born — his father, Allan, is from Brooklyn, N.Y., while his mother, Merrilee, is from East Lansing, Mich. — both adjusted to life as Canadian hockey parents.

Allan Brand serves as shammas at the Beaches Hebrew Institute and Aaron grew up attending Sunday classes there as well as being bar mitzvahed at the shul. His mother teaches ESL workshops and he has two sisters, Micaela and Naomi.

His father "is always the first to point out there's a Jewish guy in some sport, so he wants me to be proud of that," Aaron said.

While he works hard to get to the NHL and give his father some special pride, Brand continues to hone his craft and patiently wait.

About jobs

Dear Lisa,

I don't know if I should go for training to help me in my next job. What do you think?

Dear Reader,

You should always aim to be as highly trained as possible in whatever line of work you do. Employers usually like their employees to stay current in their skills.

If you have lost your job, training may be useful. Today most jobs require computer competence. You should know a word processing package like WordPerfect or Works, a spreadsheet program and a database program. Learning a graphics program may be useful if you think you could be producing fancy reports or brochures. In addition, many companies ask for the ability to use e-mail and the Internet.

Before you start any course, check to see which programs are most popular in your line of work. Read Help Wanted ads in the newspaper. Speak to your colleagues and co-workers and listen to their opinions. You may even try to contact graduates from the program to which you want to apply and see how they are using their new skills

Courses are available at community colleges, community centres, libraries and high schools. Before you sign up for a course, find out how much time is spent studying about the programs and how much time is spent on a computer practising what you are learning. Also, make sure the equipment you will use is recent – you don't want to learn on outdated equipment that you'll never see in a workplace.

Other courses to consider include time management, stress management, communication, conflict resolution and goal setting. Learning these skills will make you feel better about yourself and will keep you in a positive frame of mind. They'll also offer opportunities for you to network. The Learning Annex in Toronto is one place to look for these types of courses. Other locations to check include hotels, convention centres and libraries.

Many skills can be developed through volunteer work. Opportunities exist in different areas and you may develop a wide variety of skills including leadership skills, customer service skills or public speaking skills. Contact the Volunteer Centre in your community.

Many jobs that have become common today were not around 10 years ago. So it's important to stay on top of the trends in preparation for what you might find yourself doing 10 years from now.

Syria has chemical weapons

Israel defence minister warns Assad against use

By ARIEH O'SULLIVAN
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — Plans for a devastating attack on Syria that could topple the regime of President Hafez al-Assad would be implemented if Damascus used non-conventional weapons against Israel, Defence Minister Yitzhak Mordechai said last Sunday.

He accused Syria of developing a particularly lethal type of nerve gas with Russia's help, and vowed to retaliate severely if such a weapon were turned on Israel.

"We are not threatening anyone, and certainly not the Syrians," Mordechai said in an interview on Israel Radio, repeating his call for the Syrians to resume peace talks.

"But if someone dares carry out a threat against us, a missile threat, and certainly a threat of chemical weapons, they need to know that we have all the forces and capabilities to reply with a devastating war," he added.

"If someone dares to use [chemical] weapons of this kind against us, it is clear that we will respond with all means at our disposal and we will inflict a hard blow on Syria, whose regime would probably be at risk. They would do well not to do this and to find other ways to resolve the conflict," Mordechai said.

Speaking to reporters during a visit to the Negev later in the day, Mordechai said the Sunday Times of London had quoted him out of context as threatening to topple Assad's rule if a war broke out with Syria.

Religious pluralism dominant theme at CJF General Assembly

By MORDECHAI BEN-DAT
CJN Editor

SEATTLE — The 1996 General Assembly of the Council of Jewish Federations (CJF) concluded last Saturday night in Seattle, Wash., with an assurance to North American Jewry by Israel's Minister of Industry and Trade Natan Sharansky that there was "absolutely no chance that the attempts to change the status quo will succeed."

Sharansky was referring to the agreement worked out by Israel's first prime minister David Ben-Gurion nearly 50 years ago with the Orthodox establishment in Israel regarding the legal and social accommodation between Halachah, or religious law, and secular law in the then nascent state.

Please see Editorial Page 8

The possibility of changes to the status quo has recently returned to the centre of the political stage in Israel and thus, also to the centre of Israel-Diaspora relations. Two events have brought it there: the recent tabling of a bill in the Knesset by the government's religious coalition parties that would invalidate non-Orthodox conversions in Israel; and a directive by the Supreme Court to the Netanyahu government to resolve by the end of February the issue of group prayer by women at the Western Wall.

Any attempt to legally invalidate non-Orthodox conversions would be regarded by the majority of affiliated North American Jewry, most of whom are either Conservative or Reform, as nothing less than relegation to second class religious status.

Despite the fact that the ostensible theme of the assembly was planning for the next 100 years of the federation movement, the issue of religious pluralism within the Jewish people, and within Israel specifically, dominated the five-day conference. It was addressed every day from the podium during plenary sessions by keynote speakers and discussed around the tables in forums, workshops and even lounges by delegates and participants.

JERUSALEM – The feminization of poverty is becoming increasingly acute, said social welfare experts this week at a Council of Women's Organizations in Israel seminar on Women in Poverty.

Women's Group Attacked

JERUSALEM – A discussion on the beautification of Baruch Goldstein's grave descended into a left-right exchange in the Knesset interior committee last week. HIGH PRIESTS' GATE UNCOVERED AT WALL

One of the major discoveries of the current excavations at the Western Wall is the massive gateway through which the High Priest used to pass beyond the wall and into the Temple compound and the Holy of Holies.

The excavations run beneath the streets of the Moslem quarter of the Old City. What one can see when standing in the public compound thrown open for worship at the southern end of the Western Wall is but a small fraction of the 525 yards of the Wall. Above ground, the Wall has either disappeared or been incorporated into existing buildings.

TORONTO JDL MAY SECEDE

The Toronto branch of the Jewish Defence League (JDL) is "entertaining the prospect of disaffiliation" with the international organization, according to JDL co-chairman Milton Eugene. If this happens, he said, "a new militant organization would be formed which we hope would attract more support."

Eugene worries that many people have not been associated with the JDL because of "bad publicity" it received elsewhere.

CJC chair gets rough ride on separation issue

By MAURICE LUCOW
CJN Westen Correspondent

VANCOUVER – Max Bernard of Montreal, national unity chair of Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) was given somewhat of a rough ride when he was interviewed on radio here on the subject of Quebec separation.

Bernard, who spoke at a public meeting in the Jewish Community Centre, was interviewed earlier in the day on CKNW by Rafe Mair, a former British Columbia MLA, who has the top-rated talk show in Vancouver.

Mair asked what CJC is doing about the Quebec situation and Bernard replied that over the past five years, CJC representives have travelled across the country, speaking to politicians and to the media in an effort to promote federalism and to emphasize the distinction between what Quebec politicians want and what most Quebecers want.

He said CJC has been trying to explain that the average Quebecer wants a place as a francophone in Canada. The French want to retain their language and traditions and should have more recognition, but not necessarily the distinct society label.

"I don't understand what in the world the Quebecers are concerned about," Mair said. "They were granted language rights in 1763. In preserving their language, they've discriminated against the English. They passed a language law which could have been disallowed by the federal government. If British Columbia passed a discriminatory law like the Quebec law on English on signs, the feds would likely disallow it immediately. That's not fair."

Mair claimed the federal government didn't act because "it needed those Quebec MPs."

Bernard said he was doubtful about this and contended that there was no reason why Quebec federalists could not meet with other Canadians to find a reasonable accommodation to the whole problem.

Mair complained that a 50 percent plus one vote in the House of Commons gives Quebec and Ontario 100 percent power over Parliament's agenda. British Columbia, he said, has no connection with Ottawa policy except for a few minor cabinet posts.

"If we tried to settle our complaints with Ottawa, we would be vetoed by Quebec," he claimed.

Bernard agreed that the feeling of "powerlessness" of western MPs is not satisfactory and he called for a change in the system. He said he was certain Quebec would "be on your side."

At the meeting, Bernard admitted that at the start of the referendum campaign, there was "a certain degree of complacency" on the part of non-separatists and as the campaign ended, federalists assumed they had a monopoly on the political pact that exists between Canadians, but "the separatists appealed to the heart and cleverly proposed a new partnership in the aftermath of secession. You know the results too well."

Bernard said there was "tremendous anger and frustration amongst federalists after the vote, because many Quebecers believed the transition to independence would be relatively problem-free and they had been less hesitant about supporting separation.

"The result of this is talk of Plan B, which outlines the complications in defining terms for the breakup of the country."

Plan B is not the answer, Bernard said. What must develop is a solution that promotes harmony between Canadians "and most notably between English Canadians, French Canadians, ethnic minorities and native communities."

Bernard appealed to all Canadians to show "a spirit of openness, harmony and cooperation of which we are so rightly proud by giving such recognition for what is simply a demographic reality of Canada."

CJC stays out of debate on Israeli conversions

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO – A motion to ask the Israeli government to delay any action disallowing non-Orthodox conversions was recently defeated by the Ontario region executive of Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC). The vote, about two to one against, included a number of abstentions.

The motion made by Rabbi Jordan Pearlson, founding rabbi of Temple Sinai, asked that the CJC national executive request that the Knesset communicate further with the Diaspora before taking action.

"This has a divisive potential," said region chair Moshe Ronen. "You could achieve no less by writing a letter to the CJC."

Rabbi Pearlson declined Ronen's offer to withdraw the motion before it went to a vote.

The rabbi expresssed apprehension that the Knesset is about to act on the matter. "There should be further investigation before another blunder is made," he said.

The new law being considered affects only conversions in Israel, not those made by non-Orthodox rabbis elsewhere, said delegate Kurt Rothschild expressing opposition to the motion.

Ronen agreed with Rabbi Pearlson that the minutes of the region meeting when forwarded to the CJC will get his point across.

Prior to this motion, the executive heard that Jewish students at Ryerson Polytechnic University are still experiencing some forms of anti-Semitism.

The admission came from President Claude Lajeunesse.

"The situation is getting better," said Lajeunesse, explaining that the anti-Semitism of which he spoke referred to graffiti or comments by writers or speakers on campus, rather than difficulties in any particular discipline or area of the university.

There is a large active Jewish student body among its 13,000 full-time students, said Lajeunesse, paying tribute to Hillel and Jewish Student Services.

Students themselves are the leading force for changing attitudes on the campus, he said. As an example, he noted that for the first time observant Muslim women are being given use of the swimming pool for a certain period and they have extended an invitation to Jewish women to join the group.

On another community matter, delegate Dr. Naim Dallal objected that a letter circulated by Shalom Achshav (Peace Now) contravened a motion at the plenary CJC convention calling for support of the Israeli government.

"This is a democratic, umbrella group [the region] and I don't expect the left and right to say the same thing," said Ronen. However, he said the matter would be discussed by the region's officers.

Mideast undergoing 'stunning' regression, says Israeli editor

BY CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Special to the CJN

TORONTO – The past four months have seen a "stunning" regression in the Middle East, says the editor-in-chief of the Jerusalem Report.

JEWISH BOOK FAIR

"This reminds me of how fragile the Middle East situation is," Hirsh Goodman told a sold-out crowd at the 20th annual Jewish Book Fair.

Goodman, who wrote the prologue for Shalom Friend: Life and Legacy of Yitzhak Rabin, written by the Jerusalem Report staff and edited by David Horovitz, said he is unsure if Israel learned a proper lesson from Rabin's death.

"The date of his death should have been made a memorial day in order to teach the horrors of political assassination. We have to inculcate that murder is not a part of political dialogue. The ultra-Orthodox adamantly refuse to honor the day and many rabbis still believe that Rabin was leading Israel on the road to disaster," Goodman said.

Shimon Peres took over without a mandate from the people, and "instead of calling an election right away, he stayed in power. And then when he did call an election, he ran a terrible campaign. He thought that it was not up to him to campaign because he was already the prime minister. [Benjamin] Netanyahu understood the new electoral system while Peres did not. Netanyahu knew that he needed only one vote to become prime minister," said Goodman.

Netanyahu may have won, he said, but the Likud party lost one-third of its seats and that put the prime minister in a difficult position.

"He had to bring in a plethora of small parties from [Natan] Sharansky's party to the National Religious Party to Shas. He won, but he had to pay a huge price in terms of promises to these factions. He came into power having to make political deals.

"My deepest hope is that I will vote for Netanyahu in four years because I also want an open western economy and peace – everything he does – but my optimism has a cloud over it. Here is a prime minister who is committed to disparate parties and who has no professional advice. Secret polls show that if an election were held tomorrow, he would lose. He has time to correct however, and I hope he does."

Goodman praised Netanyahu for being intelligent and articulate with a clear understanding of economics. "I know he will grow into the job, but the question is, at what price...A learning curve is involved and he is under a microscope, but we do not have a margin of error.

"Israel is a fragile place; however it is resiliant and living there is like being on a roller coaster," said Goodman, who made aliyah 32 years ago. "We all share one concern, though, and that is Israel's welfare. Perhaps this is the end of a bad period and the dawn of a new one with a prime minister who has gone through the learning curve and will lead us to a new future."

Militant Islamic fundamentalism seen as top threat

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO – Militant Islamic-fundamentalism is the greatest threat to Western interests today, says an expert on Middle East terrorism.

Operating under the guise of legally-based religious, educational and charitable organizations, militant groups such as Islamic Jihad and Hamas have established command and control headquarters in Western countries, Steven Emerson, an American journalist, told the Canadian Club last week.

Emerson recalled the case of the current leader of Islamic Jihad, who, until his appointment last year, was a professor at the University of South Florida in Tampa.

Emerson, the producer of the TV documentary Jihad in America, declared that millions of dollars were raised in Tampa to disseminate propaganda and to "carry out operations."

Claiming that the rise of radical Islam poses a serious national security problem to the United States and Canada, Emerson said the objectives of these groups are threefold: to establish Islamic regimes in the Arab world, to destroy Israel and to ensure that Islam "reigns supreme" beyond the borders of the Middle East.

These groups regard the West, with its capitalist system and its division between religion and state, as the enemy of Islam.

Wherever they operate, be it North America, Europe or the Middle East, they pass themselves off as religious and civil rights organizations, he said.

As a result, law enforcement agencies are unable or unwilling "to go after" them.

And the Western media, he added, have served as their " willing or unwilling dupes."

Some Islamic fundamentalist leaders portray themselves as moderate Muslims and the media "fall for it," he claimed.

Emerson, whose articles have appeared in the New York Times and Wall Street Journal, charged that the media have been unwilling to investigate or expose these groups.

Pointing out that Canada is not immune to the allure of Islamic fundamentalism, Emerson disclosed that one of the most politically extreme Islamic newspapers is published in Toronto.

Describing it as an anti-Semitic publication, Emerson said it celebrated the series of suicide bombings which rocked Israel last February and March.

Drawing a distinction between Islam and Islamic fundamentalism, Emerson said there had never been a Reformation in Islam and, thus, it lacked a "central moderating force" capable of rejecting violence unequivocably.

Emerson said that, in addition to the West and Israel, radical Islamic organizations wage war against "moderate Islam."

He warned that unless the West confronts the issue of Islamic fundamentalism, the 1993 World Trade Centre bombing in Manhattan, which was masterminded by an Egyptian Muslim cleric, will be seen as "the opening shot" of a protracted battle.

Taking a question from the floor, one of only two, Emerson said there has been a coalescence between Islamic fundamentalism and neo-Nazism. As an example, he cited the case of a neo-Nazi who had converted to Islam and had become a radical Muslim.

Turning to Iran, Emerson said it was definitely a source of terrorism in ideological, financial and military terms.

Economic sanctions imposed on Iran by the United States won't work because of a lack of cooperation on the part of other countries, he observed.

But even if the U.S. succeeds in isolating Iran, terrorism will not be nipped in the bud, warned Emerson. With the advent of the Internet, he suggested, terrorists can easily communicate with each other on a wide-ranging basis.

UJA Federation committee wins award

TORONTO – The chair of the UJA Federation action committee on Jewish continuity has won the 1995 World Habitat Award.

Les Klein and his associate Sheldon Levitt were in Budapest recently to receive the architectural award for their non-profit housing project in Mississauga, Ont.

Klein and Levitt of Quadrangle Architects Limited of Toronto are the first Canadians to win the award that recognizes human settlement projects which offer sustainable futures to residents and which provide practical and imaginative solutions to current housing problems in developed and developing countries.

The Tatry and Arbour Mills Non-Profit Housing development is a 248-unit apartment complex consisting of a 13-storey and a seven-storey building, with retail outlets along the street.

Innovations in construction of exterior walls and windows and in electricity generation and conversion resulting in a 50 percent energy savings make the project one of the most advanced residential developments in Canada.

This was the first time Hungarian-born Klein returned to his home town of Jyor after fleeing the country with his family in 1956. He visited places where he grew up, including his old apartment, now used as a music school, and the synagogue where his father used to pray, but he was deeply saddened by the deterioration of the city's nearly non-existent Jewish community.

"Budapest used to be known as one of the largest Jewish communities in Europe," Klein said. Today it is a skeleton community beyond the throws of crisis."

As chair of the action committee which supports a variety of initiatives aimed at ensuring the future of Toronto's Jewish community, Klein was especially moved by the stark contrast between the communities.

"Here in Toronto, says Klein, "we often lose sight of the luxury we have and the diversity, vibrancy and strength of our Jewish community. Here, we're always building for the future."

Nuremberg trials chosen over execution to record crimes, says former prosecutor

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to the CJN

TORONTO – At the end of World War II, the Allies briefly considered executing Nazi war criminals without trial, but opted to try them for their crimes in a court of justice, an American lawyer who served as a prosecuting counsel at Nuremberg told a Toronto audience recently.

HOLOCAUST EDUCATION WEEK

Speaking to a lunch gathering of the Jewish Civil Rights Educational Foundation during Holocaust Education Week, Whitney Harris explained that the prevalent attitude among the Allied forces in 1945 was that trials for Nazi war criminals "would command maximum public support, receive the respect of history, and cause a full record to be made of Nazi crimes…It was not an arbitrary exercise of power on the part of the victorious nations but the expression of international law."

The 22 Nazi defendants at Nuremberg included Hermann Goering, commander-in-chief of the German Air Force and Hitler's designated successor; Rudolf Hess, Hitler's deputy and second in command; Joachim Von Ribbentrop, Reich minister for foreign affairs; Julius Streicher, editor of the anti-Semitic newspaper Der Stuermer; and Martin Bormann, head of the Party Chancery, who was tried in absentia.

As the trial approached, the prosecution team assembled masses of documents and took hundreds of affidavids as evidence. Not quite sure of the activities of the Einsatzgruppen killing units, Harris recalled that he asked one former unit member, Otto Ohlendorf, how many men, women and children he had killed – and was stunned to hear the response: "About 90,000."

Harris was also present at the interrogation of Rudolf Hess, the commandant of Auschwitz, who confessed that he had overseen the gassing and burning of 2.5 million people.

Harris reported that in his closing speech, Justice "Robert Jackson said...'If you would say that this man is not guilty, it would be as true to say there had been no war and no people murdered.'"

While almost all of the defendants had pleaded not guilty, most were found guilty; only three were acquitted. Goering, Ribbentrop and nine other defendants including the absent Bormann were sentenced to death by hanging. Hess received a sentence of imprisonment for life, and the others received sentences of varying degrees of imprisonment.

"I was present at the Palace of Justice on the fateful night in 1946 when Goering had cheated the hangman while lying in his cell," said Harris. "Death came to Goering by his own hand as it had come to Hitler before him."

Rudolf Hess committed suicide in 1987 after 41 years of imprisonment "and with his death the Hitler tyranny ended," Harris said. "They had intended to establish a new order in Europe but they built on pillars of hate and what they built could not stand."

Harris spoke proudly of his role in establishing the precedents of international law at Nuremberg, which the United Nations approved in 1946.

"These laws send a strong signal to those who would use the cover of war to commit atrocities," he said.

The author of Tyranny On Trial: The Evidence At Nuremberg, Harris summed up what he considered the most important precedents established at Nuremberg:

- The initiating and waging of aggressive war, the violation of the laws or customs of war, and any inhumane acts committed upon civilians during such a war, are crimes.
- Persons may be held accountable for crimes committed by them as heads of state or pursuant to superior orders.
- A person charged with crime under international law is entitled to a fair trial.

Although Harris noted ruefully that "force is displacing the rule of law in the conduct between nations" in the latter half of this century, he observed that some Nuremberg precedents have been applied to situations in Yugoslavia, Rwanda and elsewhere.

Zundel, neo-Nazis thrive on falsehoods

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO – The only way Holocaust denier Ernst Zundel and the neo-Nazi Heritage Front can claim legitimacy is if they can prove to the world that the Holocaust did not happen, a Remembrance Day service at Richmond Hill United Church was told recently."

Steven Shulman

HOLOCAUST EDUCATION WEEK

"If the Holocaust didn't happen, their message is 'Why not be friends with the Nazis?'" said Steven Shulman, national associate director of community relations, Canadian Jewish Congress.

About 150 church members heard stirring organ music and youth and adult choirs commemorating those who died in World Wars prior to Shulman's address. A workshop on Neo-Nazism Roots and Present Challenges followed the church service led by the minister, Abigail Johnson.

One of Congress' concerns is that neo-Nazis today are attracting young people to their meetings (average age, 17 to 25), while in the 1980s the average age was 60 to 70, Shulman said. "This demographic shift is of great concern. Why are young people attracted to the movement?"

While systemic anti-Semitism with its quotas on professions is no longer a problem, there are still concerns about racism, particularly in Toronto, which has the greatest proportion of Holocaust survivors anywhere in the world, outside of Israel, Shulman said.

Jews, blacks and immigrants are blamed by the Heritage Front for economic hardships in Canada, he said. "They've watered down their message: instead of sheets over their heads they call themselves white."

Anti-Semitism and all forms of racism are facts of life in Canada today, the CJC official said. "I'm not suggesting that we face an impending Holocaust in Canada. Anti-Semitism is no longer acceptable in public discourse."

Ideological problems now plague Israel

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO – The post-Zionist debate in Israel has reached such an "alarming" stage that "some leaders of Jewry are against the idea of a Jewish state," according to the director of the Jerusalem think-tank Shalem Centre.

It's an issue that cuts across party lines, "with some people in the Likud saying we don't need a state," said Yoram Hazony, speaking to the executive of the Ontario region of Canadian Jewish Congress.

"A tremendous majority of Israelis have difficulty with the concept of a Jewish state no matter how you define it," he said.

The 32-year-old resident of a town in the territories assisted Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu in writing his two most recent books. On the whole, he was given rapt attention by the Ontario region executive, but some members walked out, disagreeing with his statement that Zionism is dead in the water in Israel.

The Holocaust ended the argument about whether there should be a Jewish state, but after 50 years of consensus, the debate has broken out anew in what Israeli editors say is a struggle between Zionists and post-Zionists.

The "de-Zionization" of the Jewish state started during the Labor party tenure with an attempt to amend Hatikvah, opposition to high school trips to Auschwitz, ruling Masada off-limits for VIP itineraries and a watering down of the patriotic codes of IDF forces, Hazony said.

"There are rising calls for amendment of the Law of Return, essentially to revoke it, and instead Israel would become a state of all its citizens. This is aimed at Diaspora Jews, not at Arabs."

He added: "Israel is in an advanced stage of ideological disintegration."

Pleas for pluralism

The majority of the Jews affiliated to organized, "denominational" Jewish life in North America are understandably concerned with the state of religious pluralism in Israel. Essentially, there is none. There is what is known as the "historic status quo," a legal and social modus vivendi between the religious and the secular worlds which was brokered by David Ben-Gurion at the time of Israel's founding.

But now certain forces in Israel are trying to alter the status quo. Recently, religious members of the governing coalition introduced legislation in the Knesset to prohibit non-Orthodox conversions. The implications of such a change are far-reaching for non-Orthodox Jewish movements, by far the majority in North America.

Religious pluralism in Israel, or more accurately, its lack, was the chief topic of concern among most of the participants at the recently concluded 65th General Assembly (GA) of the Council of Jewish Federations (CJF) in Seattle. The board of governors of the CJF even felt it necessary to pass a strongly-worded resolution at the beginning of the assembly to convey the body's clear, but forceful views to the leaders of Israel: "To abstain from amending legislation or passing any new legislation that would change the current situation regarding recognition of conversions...

"We the Board of Delegates assembled at this 65th General Assembly of the Council of Jewish Federations, meeting at a critical moment concerning this issue, urge the leaders of Israel not to underestimate the strength of feeling on this matter, and its detrimental effect on Jewish unity and Israel-Diaspora relations."

For his part, Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu attempted to defuse the ticking bomb before the Seattle conference began by clarifying his government's position in a letter to the American leadership. He wrote: "It has come to my attention that a misunderstanding has caused a controversy over [a bill] that has been interpreted as affecting conversions in the Diaspora. I want to make clear that I shall oppose legislation which will change the status quo regarding conversions outside of Israel."

The prime minister repeated his position directly to the participants at the assembly by satellite from his office in Jerusalem: "We are not going to change anything regarding conversions in the United States or anywhere else in the Diaspora. We will adamantly refuse to affect any changes regarding this."

Natan Sharansky, minister of Industry and Trade, and leader of Yisrael b'Aliyah, also emphasized his party's objection to a change in the conversion law telling GA delegates there was "absolutely no chance that these attempts to change the satus quo will succeed."

Despite these top-level assurances, many of the delegates still remained sceptical, noting that even a "compromise" form of the bill would still be an insult to the religious legitimacy of the non-Orthodox movements, both inside and outside Israel. Referring to the impending bill, Rabbi Ammiel Hirsch, executive director of the Association of Reform Zionists of America told the Jewish Week "It's an absolute affront to world Jewry." Rabbi Ismar Schorsch, chancellor of the Jewish Theological Seminary, echoed the same sentiments. He told the Jewish Week, that such a law could "distance Israel from the Diaspora."

For their part, the proponents of the bill expect the prime minister to allow the bill to go forward to fulfil his coalition obligations. Netanyahu is in a bind. His parliamentary majority depends upon his satisfying the religious parties who have put the bill forward and for whom it is an important matter of principle. But his "Diaspora majority" depends upon his resisting the bill's passage in any form. Pleading for pluralism, they urge him to encourage suasion not coercion, dialogue not disassociation, mutuality not exclusivity. The prime minister must decide the issue without dividing the two "majorities."

A Remembrance Day memoir

I was a young man, an ordinary immigrant. Luckily, I got a job in the Laurentians, at the Hotel Castle des Monts. We had just survived the Holocaust, happy to be in this country. We were busboys, then waiters, and one day after we had finished our day's work, we took a walk in the neigborhood. The next hotel was the Laurentide Inn, and a large sign at the door indicated that "Dogs and Jews are not welcome."

What a feeling came over us! It seems hatred knew no borders. Can you imagine, if our heroes had not given their lives, you and I would not have a country where one has the opportunity to live in freedom and dignity.Could those hateful people comprehend that their present life would be slightly different? But history has shown that this sort of unfortunate layer of society exists all over the world. I pity them.

God bless our heroes and our country Canada forever.

Smoking in Mea Shearim and Thornhill

Today I watched a yeshiva boy committing suicide...slowly, His friend helped by offering him a light. Are cigarettes kosher? I was alarmed to see young boys smoking in Mea Shearim and equally concerned to witness the trend in Thornhill.

Grape products are subject to restriction because they were once (and still may be) used in avoda-zara (idol-worship or paganism). Tobacco was and still is used in religious rites in some cultures as well. So, why does tobacco not have the same restrictions as wine?

Some rebbes are hooked on the weed. They can't give it up. And not only that – their students see them smoking, and as the song goes, "Un, az de rebbe tanzt, tanzen alleh Chassidim."

My case is of course augmented by the fact that the Ribono-Shel-Olam would not be at all amused to see us willfully harming our bodies by pulling toxic smoke into our lungs and then exhaling it into the air to poison others.

Will Roux affair soften Bouchard and Parizeau

The revelations that Quebec Lt.-Gov. Jean-Louis Roux wore a swastika and took part in anti-conscription rallies, 50 years ago are shocking and disturbing. His expression of regret is inadequate.

One would have thought that before recommending his appointment to the Queen, Prime Minister Chrétien would have meticulously researched Roux's background. Deputy Prime Minister Sheila Copps' comment that the incidents should be dismissed as youthful actions is unacceptable, inappropriate and totally insentive.

The protestations of the Bloc Québécois and the premier of Quebec are insincere and totally self-serving. They take delight in the fact that they can embarrass Roux because he is a federalist.

Instead of resigning, the lieutenant-governor should have issued an unqualified apology for his actions and an affirmative condemnation of all forms of anti-Semitism and racism. That would have satisfied all right-thinking Canadians and perhaps might have had a sobering effect on Lucien Bouchard and Jacques Parizeau and their fellow travellers and might have impressed upon them that there is no place anywhere in Canada for attacks and abuses of minorities.

Avinu Malkeinu answer to Harrris cuts

Perhaps it is time for our Jewish leaders to appeal to our community, young and old to do something more than protesting "government cuts." I am convinced that the Ontario government can learn a great deal from our Jewish determination to put into practice our Avinu Malkeinu prayers. We must always protest against governments that treat Jews differently from other citizens. A case in point would be Jewish education. Government cuts is not the issue now.

I do not want to say either – Chas vechalila – that this current situation is coming as a blessing to our community, so that we could start to take care of our own needs, and our own Jews.

Perhaps this current situation is a strong reminder to all Jews all over the world that we survived in spite of "government cuts" – cuts that go deeper than Mike Harris cuts.

Our challenge today, I believe, is how not to get lost as a people. Let's embrace this challenge of caring one for each other with honor.

A deeply cherished way of life

The first Jewish immigrants to Canada, in the 18th century, were Sephardim. The oldest synagogue in Canada is the Spanish and Portuguese Synagogue, Shearith Israel of Montreal, founded in 1768.

The Communauté Sépharade du Québec (CSQ), the "inheritor" of the Association sépharade francophone (ASF) that was founded in 1966, to represent the Sephardi community in Quebec, is celebrating its 30th anniversary this year.

The CJN has compiled the accompanying photo essay to commemorate the anniversary. It celebrates the heritage, the history, the costume, the splendor and the poignancy of a deeply cherished way of life that succeeding generations can behold, and in so doing, perhaps see their parents and their grandparents more clearly, in ways more tender, as when we look into the eyes of our own children.

Time to settle outstanding claims

Recently, Syrian President Assad was on TV, waxing eloquent about Palestinian refugees in Lebanon and elsewhere, about the injustice of it all, implying if not actually spelling out the need to repatriate them to Israel. Nobody talked recently about Jews from Arab countries in Israel, the property they had to leave behind, and the injustice of that. And Russian Jews keep arriving minus their paid-for pensions.

By Emil Fackenheim

For once Assad showed his mind, if given the Golan before negotiations even start: The "Right of [the Palestinian refugees'] Return" refers to Haifa, Jerusalem, even Tel Aviv, not to the West Bank, and is a recipe for Israel's destruction. Assad's "peace" is permanent strife and – if, to "save the peace process" Israel keeps giving in – the eventual end of the Jewish state.

But for peace to be just and durable, Palestinian refugees do deserve financial restitution, provided it settles all claims, permanently. But then, Jews from Arab countries deserve restitution also, and bills might be sent to Syria, Lebanon, Egypt, Morocco, Iran, the biggest, probably, to Iraq. But Saddam Hussein paying? Or even Egypt? That would be a "New Middle East". And for Russia to pay – a sponsor of the peace process, who does not fancy herself in the dock – it would have to be a "New World."

But an alternative exists, realistic because of a precedent, of long standing, well-tested, and which works. The Federal Republic of Germany is paying restitution to Holocaust survivors or their heirs and – if there are neither – to the "Claims Conference," a Jewish organization, which then disburses the funds to Jewish communal needs. Why not expand this policy to Nazi-occupied Europe and, then – in a grand, Marshall-Plan-type Jewish action – have the Claims Conference transfer the owner-less sums to a Palestinian counterpart? From recent reports from Switzerland, these sums are considerable, much larger than the bankers would have us believe, and Switzerland (like Sweden and Portugal) though never Nazi-occupied, is part of Europe and its Nazi-related problems.

The Swiss have said that to sort out gold takes many years, if a "dangerous confusion" with gold "stolen from European central banks." is to be avoided. But this is hardly serious–the heads of these banks will submit their claims, for they are still alive. This cannot be said of Jews who had gold taken from the teeth of their corpses.

But now, with a "deepening alarm among the Swiss authorities that their credibility may be in tatters", Swiss Foreign Minister Flavio Cotti wants to "clear up this important and painful matter as quickly as possible."

It should be "cleared up" elsewhere in Europe also, and World Jewish Congress President Edgar Bronfman wants the books of France, Belgium and Sweden. Norway and Portugal which came up after his statement; Poland, Hungary and Yugoslavia are another story; and Italy has just ruled that to get persecution related old age pensions, Jews must prove they were victims of "fascism."

They want bygones to be bygones," comments an Italian Jewish leader, about Italy, but applicable to most of Europe – taking property of Jews safely dead, and keeping it.

But France heads the list. It took her 50 years to admit that Jews were handed to Nazi murderers by French policemen. Of the 330,000 Jews then living in France about 80,000 were victims, and of 76,000 sent to "the East" only 2,500 or three percent returned. These are figures by Germans, always precise in their book-keeping.

And restitution? From the French, to this day, nothing. Yet Jacques Chirac wants a "greater role" in the Mideast peace process, and – an expert on peace, after his Far East nuclear venture – he has just brought the recipe to the Middle East: for Israel to give everything – to Syria, the Golan, to the Palestinians a state, Jerusalem as capital, the refugees – and receive nothing, not even a PLO cancellation of its "Covenant" for Israel's destruction. (Arafat keeps promising it; but he has not done it, and the latest deadline has just passed.)

Solve the refugee problem – justly, permanently – and there is reason to believe that all other peace-related issues will eventually fall into place. But my "Marshall plan" has one flaw, and France gives little hope of mending it: it requires, not a "New Middle East," let alone a "New World" but a Europe "rid of Hitler's shadow" (Churchill) – a "New Europe."

Opposites can work together

Someone sent me an offprint of an article by Gary Rosenblatt which appeared in The Jewish Week, New York's medium for Jewish communication.

By Rabbi Gunther Plaut

The article headline is A Rare Exception to Communal Discord and it reports on a memorial service held in Buenos Aires last July..

The service commemorated the bombing of Argentina's Jewish communal headquarters in which 86 people lost their lives and over 300 were injured – a tragedy which remains unsolved. No perpetrators have so far been arrested.

But the emphasis of this report is not on what happened then, but what has recently occurred. At the service, Rabbi Alexander Schindler, formerly the president of the Union of American Hebrew Congregations (Reform), recited the Kaddish, followed by Rabbi Menachem Porush, a leader of the Agudath Israel (Orthodox) in Jerusalem, who offered the K'El Maleh Rachamim prayer.

Asks Rosenblatt: "Is it only through grieving for murdered brethren that Jews of various beliefs can be joined?"

Representatives of very different organizations do, in fact, work regularly together in the Memorial Foundation for Jewish Culture. I was once a board member of that group and I am happy to hear that it has become a place where opposites can peaceably meet. Rabbi Schindler was quoted as saying: "It's the only place where I can sit with a Rabbi Porush with mutual respect, because we are working together on issues of common concern – to preserve and revive Jewish culture." It is noteworthy that Rabbi Schindler recently was elected president of the foundation and Rabbi Arthur Hertzberg (Conservative) was elected vice-president.

It is also worth taking a look at the foundation of which Dr. Jerome Hochbaum is the executive director. The group was founded exactly 30 years ago when Konrad Adenauer, chancellor of West Germany, met with Nachum Goldmann, then one of the leading Jews in the Diaspora. Germany agreed to establish a fund of $35 million, US, the interest of which would go toward reviving and sustaining Jewish culture. The Jews in the former Soviet Union were amongst the recipients as well as scholars of the Holocaust, and others whose contributions helped to reenforce the foundations of Jewish life.

Among the participants in the foundation is Menachem Elon, the former chief justice of Israel's Supreme Court. He explains his interest by the fact that this foundation is "unique" in its non-ideological commitment to deal with Jewish, social and humanitarian problems.

The organization is convinced that its low-key approach is part of its success, while in this respect high profile and large amounts of money are often counter-productive Rosenblatt ends his article by saying that the foundation "teaches a lesson we need to learn, as communal concerns increase and conduits for cooperation decline, and as the Holocaust – the tragic event whose memory continues to unite Jews through memory and guilt – fades into history."

Little stories tell tale of real Israel

The real news about the real Israel is to be found not in the reports about Benjamin Netanyahu or Yasser Arafat or economics or such other minor matters as make the headlines, but in the little stories that editors tuck away on the inside pages. For example:

By Carl Alpert

Ideas Pay Off. Not long ago the Ministry of Science and the Arts published ads in the Hebrew press which read in effect as follows: Israel requires creative scientific ideas. Wanted — original ideas in the fields of industrial research, the life sciences and the exact sciences. Good ideas will get grants of $50,000 each.

Local Arab Farmers Need Help Too. Limitations on the number of Arab laborers permitted to cross into Israel from the territories have affected local Arab farmers as well, and they have applied to the government for permission to hire workers from Thailand.

Cutting the Army Down to Size. Following a number of applications from female Israeli soldiers, the Medical Corps considered whether to approve cosmetic surgery to reduce the size of large breasts of women serving in the regular army. After careful and sympathetic study, a decision was rendered in the negative.

Successful Formula. Israeli businesspeople who want to know how to succeed in the American market, are now turning to Lloyd Shefsky's book, Entrepreneurs are Made, Not Born, which has recently appeared in a Hebrew translation. A test of Shefsky's formula is to be found in the fact that his secretary quit and went into business for herself.

Appropriate Name. They may not realize it, but the Hamas have chosen an appropriate name for themselves, right out of the book of Genesis. Chapter 6, verse 13 reads: "And God said unto Noah, The end of all flesh is come before me; for the earth is filled with Hamas through them; and behold I will destroy them." In this context, the accepted translation of Hamas from the Hebrew is "violence."

All Kosher. Some 40,000 tons of frozen meat are imported into Israel annually, primarily from South America, while local production of meat is only 20,000 tons.

Pupil Strikes Back. Aviv Gefen, pop singer idol of Israeli teenagers, increased his popularity among the youth when, addressing a high school group, he told them that educational counsellors had been of no help to him when he was at school. Most of them are frustrated old ladies who are starved for sex, he maintained.

Tea Without Lemon. Former Chief Rabbi Ovadia Yosef has handed down a halachic ruling to the effect that it is forbidden to add a slice of lemon to a glass of hot tea on the Sabbath. The action of the hot water on the lemon is tantamount to a cooking process, he declared.

Expertise. A local cartoonist features a culinary expert who, by smelling the breath of another, can identify which brand of pastry he has eaten, and in which cafe.

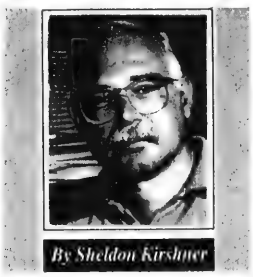
Taking Her at Her Word. When news of the Netanyahu victory was confirmed, Leah Rabin blurted out that she looked at her suitcases and considered leaving the country. An enterprising Haifa merchant purchased two pages in a local paper and headed his ad: "If Leah leaves the country, why should we not help her. All that needs to be done is to choose the right suitcase." And then follow two pages of pictures and descriptions of a long line of various suitcases, with prices.

Each One Has a Name. On Israel's Memorial Day, government TV Channel 33 broadcast during a 26-hour period, the name of each of the 19,792 men and women who have fallen in all of Israel's wars.

Advice From a Child. When a major terrorist attack took place on the eve of Purim, many of the festivities scheduled for that day were cancelled. One child objected. "Purim comes only once a year," he said, "while terrorist attacks take place every week."

The Kirshner File

Israel disappoints British novelist



By Sheldon Kirshner

Lynne Reid Banks, the British novelist who has portrayed Israel in fiction and non-fiction, is disillusioned with the country she called home for nearly a decade.

"I'm very unhappy about Israel these days," she said in a remarkably frank interview. "My whole relationship with Israel has been painful in recent years. My Zionism is crumbling."

Reid Banks, who was in Toronto recently as the guest of the International Festival of Authors, is an accomplished writer, having burst upon the literary scene in 1960 with a feminist novel entitled The L-Shaped Room, which was adapted into a movie.

Married to a Jewish sculptor who fought in the 1948 War of Independence, Reid Banks has written 30 adult and children's novels, several of which are set in Israel, most notably Children at the Gate and One More River. As well, she has produced two historical volumes, Letters To My Israeli Sons: Story of Jewish Survival and Torn Country, an oral history of the first Arab-Israeli war.

Reid Banks, who spent nine years on a kibbutz affiliated with the left-wing Hashomer Hazair movement, is so disappointed with recent political developments that she does not plan to write another novel with an Israeli setting. Her last novel which unfolded in Israel, Broken Bridge, was published in 1995.

"Israel has gone back to the dark ages," she declared vehemently, referring to the ascendancy of Benjamin Netanyahu as prime minister.

The last Likud government, she claimed, polarized Israeli society and brought Israel "very low" in its moral and international standing in the world.

And now she fears that Netanyahu, whom she loathes, will again isolate Israel.

Reid Banks, whose novels have been translated into Hebrew, was buoyed by the election of a Labor party government in 1992 . " I had the illusory hope that things would get better with the peace process," she observed. And while she never idealized Netanyahu's predecessors – Yitzhak Rabin and Shimon Peres – they were at least committed to reaching an equitable agreement with the Palestinians and Israel's Arab neighbors, she said.

Netanyahu, she warned, is diverging from this course, and will cause "terrible harm" to Israel, a country she intially visited in 1960, when she was 31.

" I was completely in love with Israel," said Reid Banks, a former actress and television journalist who was born in London, England, the daughter of an Irish actress and a Scottish doctor. "What made Israel so wonderful, for me, was that it was a dream fulfilled. I had been passionately interested in Israel since the end of World War II."

Reid Banks and her mother spent the war years as evacuees in Saskatoon, Sask.When she returned to England at the age of 15, shocked and repelled by the enormity of the Holocaust, she was utterly convinced that the Jewish people deserved a state in what was then Palestine.

The Holocaust not only inculcated in her a sympathy for Zionism, but a keener appreciation of anti-Semitism, a mild strain of which ran in her family (her mother , for example, cautioned her against marrying a Jew.)

She disregarded her bigoted advice. After returning to England from her first trip to Israel, she met Chaim Stephenson, a British Jew of Russian origin who had immigrated to Israel and was now in England studying sculpture. They fell in love, and in December 1962, against her mother's express wishes, she followed him back to Israel, to Yas'ur, a kibbutz in the western Galilee which he had helped establish in 1949.

Reid Banks did not convert to Judaism when she married Stephenson, to whom she bore three boys, Omri, Gillon and Adiel. " I am completely a non-believer," she explained. " There is something basically dishonest about adopting a religion to make your life easier." And yet Reid Banks feels a special affinity with Jews. As she put it: "I'm not a Jew, but I'm Jewish."

On Yas'ur, which stood on land which had been expropriated from the Arab village of al-Burwa, Reid Banks worked in the chicken house and in the vineyard, cooked breakfasts and, ultimately, taught English. She was "madly happy" there, despite her disagreement with the kibbutz's child-rearing methods.

Reid Banks learned a modicum of Hebrew, words and phrases of which appear in her "Israeli" novels. "My Hebrew is very poor. I speak a nursery-level Hebrew. I can chat, but I can't understand the news, which is terrible. I never attended an ulpan. I plunged straight into kibbutz life."

In nine years on Yas'ur, Reid Banks wrote only one novel. "I was completely absorbed by kibbutz life," she said. "I felt my life was full. And after the birth of my first son, there wasn't a lot of time for writing."

On the eve of the Six Day War, she was pregnant with her second son. And in the nerve-wracking weeks before hostilities broke out, she rarely thought of the existential dangers which confronted Israel. "It should have been a very scary period for me, but all I could think of was whether I would have my baby before the school play." Only after the war did she imagine what could have happened had Israel lost the war.

Like the Israelis in her midst, Reid Banks was euphoric over Israel's historic military victory. But the euphoria wore off when she concluded that the land Israel had conquered would not be returned. "The territories," she said, " have been a curse."

In 1971, she and her family left Yas'ur on a one year sabbatical. Reid Banks and her husband, a gardener on the kibbutz, hoped to develop their careers . Reid Banks herself wanted to tend to her children (who had been raised in children's houses) and to spend more time with her aging mother.

Reid Banks spent years on a kibbutz

When they asked for an extension, the kibbutz refused. Reid Banks and her husband decided not return to Yas'ur, a decision they do not regret. "It's just not the country I knew."

Reid Banks, however, has often gone back to visit friends. During the 1991 Gulf War, when Israel was hit by 39 Iraqi Scud missiles, she flew to Israel in an expression of solidarity with the country and her friends.

Israel's future remains a source of concern to her. She fears there will be a war if the peace process collapses, but she is not sanguine about the Oslo accords , which, in her opinion, are as good as dead.

In assessing her mercurial connection with Israel, Reid Banks is philosophic but bitter.

"I'm not sorry for a day of it," she said of her sojourn in Israel. "I'm not sorry that I was a part of. I'm just sorry it has gone so sour," she mused, referring to Israel's drift to the right.

JWI gives top honors to TD's chief economist

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO – Ruth Getter, senior vice-president and chief economist of the Toronto Dominion Bank (TD), recently received Jewish Women International (JWI) of Toronto's Woman of the Year Award at its annual Covenant Breakfast.

The mandate of the Woman of the Year committee is to select a Canadian woman who has reached a high level of excellence in her career, volunteer work or who has made an outstanding contribution in her chosen field, Woman of the Year chair Leah Shilling said.

Previous honorees include Gerda Frieberg, Dr. Nehama Baum, Dorothy Reitman, Honey Agar, Chaviva Hosek, Bea Wolfe, Margaret Laurence and June Callwood.

Getter was honored, said Shilling, not only because of her career excellence but because she has helped to create a better environment for the career advancement of women.

"Ruth is in a career where traditionally only men reach the top and she is the top...As a senior women executive, Ruth was a key member of a group of senior women who initiated the Task Force for the Advancement of Women at TD. In speaking with Ruth, you can instantly tell how proud she is of this work."

Today, said Shilling, "Ruth sits on one of the Task Force subcommittees, most recently focusing on a pilot mentoring program. She also acts as a mentor to several women and men. She has received much recognition and has even been described as having cracked the glass ceiling in a male-dominated field. She has been hailed a renegade by some and is frequently asked to share her experience with outside groups."

Mitzi Dickstein, president JWI of Canada, commended the organization for choosing Getter as an award recipient.

"Ruth, you have served as a role model to all of us concerned with advancing women's effectiveness, with the aims of developing leadership and expertise to enhance our careers, communities and home lives. Through your sheer determination, self-confidence, your refusal to give up and you willingness to fight when the going got tough, you achieved tremendous academic success and broke the glass ceiling in the banking industry."

In accepting the award, Getter said that "my position at TD has allowed me to be in a position to help other women. I am glad to be in that position to listen and help."

UJA Federation

CAMPAIGN HEADS FOR THIRTY

The 1997 UJA Federation campaign is on its way to the $30 million mark, with 21,000 donors.

The amount of money raised to date is ahead of last year at this time, but particularly pleasing to campaign leaders is UJA Federation's success with new contributors. More than 1,000 gifts are in from people who have never before donated.

Gary Grundman, who is chairing the new gifts effort with Rosanne Ain, believes the organization is making excellent progress toward its objective of 3,000 first-time contributors. "Acquiring over 1,000 new gifts is a great accomplishment," he says. "We're especially proud of the tremendous inroads we've made in York Region through enthusiastic outreach and fabulous programs."

UJA Federation will be continuing its appeal to new donors with a Chanuka telethon, December 8, at the Lipa Green Building. Anyone interested in participating should call Silvia Astrug at (416) 635-2883 ext. 115.

University students on campuses across Toronto are more actively involved than ever before in UJA Federation activities.

The efforts of UJA Federation's Jewish Campus Services (JCS) at York University, University of Toronto, Seneca College and Ryerson Polyechnic University are responsible for the increased participation.

Over 40 students made campaign calls on Super Sunday and a special student telethon is being planned for November 24 at the Lipa Green Building.

Jewish students at York organized a month long charity drive in September and the sale of colourful Love UR Roots T-shirts, which are also being sold on the other three campuses.

A city-wide dance, held in October, raised $3,000 and drew more than 1,000 students to the York Underground.

Jewish students at Ryerson and Seneca have also rallied behind UJA Federation by donating money raised from campus barbecues and pizza sales.

"UJA on Campus is a great way to get unaffiliated students connected to the Jewish community," observes Johanna Levitt, city-wide program director for JCS. "It's also a great way for Jewish students to network with each other."

Tammy Nisimov, President of Hillel at Seneca College, says UJA on Campus "is an important way to raise awareness about students' Jewish identity and the community."

In addition to fundraising, Jewish students have also participated in UJA Federation's Washington Fly-In and the Arts & Entertainment Division's Business of Entertainment event.

Anthony leaves legacy of tzedaka

Charles Anthony was a man who chose his direction early in life and stuck to it until his death.

Anthony, who died recently at age 79 after battling cancer, was a strong supporter of UJA Federation and the Jewish community - a man who cared deeply about others and always stood up for his beliefs.

Born and raised in London, England, at age 22, Anthony helped locate sponsors to bring Jewish children out of Germany and find them homes in London before WW II broke out. One of those children would later become his wife.

"When he met my mother, Lotte, it was love at first sight," said Anthony's youngest daughter, Karen.

Upon arriving in Canada, Anthony found work in Glace Bay, Nova Scotia where he became very involved with its small Jewish community, helping to build the synagogue's Holy Ark (Aron Kodesh).

He returned to England during the war and shortly after his marriage, moved to a new Toronto on near Shaarei Shomayim synagogue, then located on St. Clair Avenue.

Charles Anthony

According to his daughter, Anthony chose his home using a compass to determine a location within walking distance of the synagogue. When the synagogue, with which he became very involved, moved north, Anthony again selected a house over two miles away.

"He had a definite stride that everyone could recognize when he walked to shul every Shabbat," recalled Shaarei Shomayim Rabbi Mark Dratch, who praised Anthony's service on the Board of Governors and as Executive Director. "He was a man of great integrity."

Anthony, who became successful in the real estate business, also backed the Jewish National Fund, Israel Bonds and many other charities.

"He was a very dedicated campaigner for UJA Federation," noted co-campaigner David Green. "You could always rely on Charles."

"My father always taught us that one had to give of oneself and fight for what he or she believes in," said Karen.

Anthony is survived by his wife Lotte, son John and daughters Marilyn, Debra and Karen.

LION CONFERENCE INSPIRES SOLIDARITY

A delegation of UJA Women's Campaign supporters recently returned from Jerusalem, with many new international friendships.

They joined some 500 women representing 35 countries, including 23 emerging Jewish nations, for the first ever, 5 day International Lion of Judah Conference.

Reuma Weizman, wife of Israeli President Ezer Weizman and Honourary Conference Chair, called the participants "women of valour," for their dedication to "providing a brighter future for Jews all over the world."

Leah Rabin praised the women for coming to Jerusalem in "less than ideal times" and said "you have shown your solidarity with Israel in the most precious way."

For the Canadian delegation, the highlight of the conference, "Beyond Boundaries," was the chance to meet women from developing countries such as Azerbaijan, Belarus, Slovakia, Bosnia, Lithuania, Poland, Romania, Bulgaria, Croatia, India and Cuba.

One woman, Zaga, who travelled on foot from Ethiopia before boarding a plane to Sudan ten years ago, has spent her life since then helping fellow immigrants find their way.

Sara, originally from Sarajevo, whose mother hid Jews during World War II, was forced along with her family into hiding as a result of the Bosnian civil war. Jews who had been saved by Sara's mother years before, rescued the entire family and brought them to Israel where Sara converted to Judaism.

Sara, who remarried in a Jewish ceremony and celebrated her daughter's bat mitzva, now works at Yad Vashem.

"These women are the real heroes," said Vicki Campbell, Chair of UJA Federation's Women's Campaign. "Their stories about how they almost lost their Jewishness because they were not allowed to practice Judaism had a tremendous impact on us."

"To witness the Jewish commitment of these women, under the most dire circumstances was profoundly inspirational," said Karen Morton, Chair of the Canadian delegation. "We all walked away with a renewed sense of enthusiasm and commitment."

Karen Morton, Chair of the Canadian delegation shakes hands with Sara Netanyahu as the Prime Minister looks on.

IN TOUCH

Women's Campaign adopts personal touch

UJA Federation's Women's Campaign has come up with an innovative way to make involvement with the organization more user friendly.

It's called the mentoring program and it works very much like the buddy system. Seasoned UJA Federation volunteers use their knowledge and experience to help ease newcomers into what is for many an intimidating situation.

"Women arriving at a telethon or an event for the first time often feel very uncomfortable not knowing anyone," explains Agi Mandel, Vice-Chair of Women's Campaign, who along with Campaign Chair Vicki Campbell, helped implement the program.

"Having a familiar face greeting you at the door can make all the difference."

The mentoring teams, made up of two captains, maintain regular contact with the new volunteers before programs, help train campaigners and from time to time, get together for informal meetings at someone's home.

Suzie Epelbaum at UJA Federation's Super Sunday.

Suzie Epelbaum was thankful for "not having to walk into the room alone" when she arrived to make calls on Super Sunday. "I probably wouldn't have come had my mentor not been there."

Randy Appelby Handler says the mentor program was just the thing to get her back to UJA Federation after not being involved for years, since she graduated from university. "It's really nice to have someone call up and personally invite you to a program. It's nice to see friendly faces."

Volunteer feels like she belongs

Although Miri Schneiderman is a full-time mother and nursery school teacher, her active volunteer career with UJA Federation makes the Lipa Green Building seem like her second home.

"I spend a big part of my life at Lipa Green," Schneiderman explains, "because I'm involved with so many different things."

The Israeli-born Schneiderman began her involvement with UJA Federation six years ago, after serving on the executive of the USDS Parents' Association for seven years. "I wanted to branch out into the community and a friend, Judy Engel, showed me the way."

Schneiderman recalls accompanying Engel on her first UJA Federation Community March for Israel and feeling "like I wanted to do more." Since then, she has been a member of the March Festival committee and considers herself "the hotdog person" for the event.

But Schneiderman's commitment doesn't end there. She is also a graduate of UJA Federation's Leadership Development Program, a regular telethon campaigner and an active member of Jewish Women's Federation's Shalom Toronto Committee.

"It makes me feel really good to show new arrivals to Toronto the ins and outs of the Jewish community. I remember how lonely and disoriented I was when I first moved to Toronto eight years ago," she says. "Being involved with the community makes me feel like I belong."

GUR PROVIDES DIRECTION TO OLIM

Miri Gur is a woman with connections. By using them, she has helped thousands of people start a new life in Israel.

Miri Gur

Gur has just begun a two-year term as Regional Director for the Israel Aliya Centre in Toronto, which helps hundreds of Jews make the move each year. She has devoted much of her career to acquainting new olim with life in Israel. "Helping olim," she says, "is one of the most important tasks one can do." Aliya Centre activities are financed, in part, by UJA Federation.

"For many, leaving their country is difficult," she acknowledges, "but settling in a new country requires even more hard work and adjustment."

That's where Gur's native Israeli instinct and diverse connections come into play. "People call me for help with anything from dealing with a neglectful landlord to finding a job."

In fact, many of those she has helped still keep in touch to update Gur on their progress. "To some, I feel like I'm their godmother."

Gur's choice for a mate strengthened her mission. Her husband, Baruch, currently the Jewish Agency's emissary to UJA Federation, is the architect of Operation Exodus, which rescued over 650,000 Jews from the Former Soviet Union.

Miri Gur earned a Masters degree in Education at the American University in Washington, after serving as an officer in the Israel Defence Forces.

Before moving to Toronto with her husband two years ago, Gur supervised ulpanim, where new immigrants learn Hebrew.

But now that she's in Toronto, Gur appreciates the opportunity to see the other side, even though she misses her two children, both studying law in Israel.

Second generation seeks children of survivors

A group of children of Holocaust survivors is asking others to come forward to help educate the public about what their parents suffered more than 50 years ago.

Generation to Generation, a sub-committee of UJA Federation's Holocaust Remembrance Committee, was founded six years ago by Hindy Stegman and Miriam Abbou after returning from Poland where they traced their family roots.

"We are the children that should not have been," says Abbou, who feels children of survivors "must pass on their parents legacy."

Over the years, Generation to Generation has attracted some new members by, among other means, co-sponsoring educational programs, running a telethon on the 50th anniversary of the Holocaust and organizing a successful one day conference last May.

However, Abbou and Stegman are certain there are thousands of second generation survivors who are hesistant to step forward and identify with each other. By doing so, they say, "these people can begin to heal and feel less alone."

Linda Goldman joined Generation to Generation two years ago, after designing a quilt, which now hangs at Beth Tzedec synagogue, in memory of her grandmother. Having been "obsessed" with her family's experience during the war from a young age, Goldman remains very concerned about what she calls general "apathy" toward the subject.

Hindy Stegman

"In ten years survivors will be gone and then it will be our word against theirs. I will continue to spread the truth until I'm 80."

Recruitment for the planning of the second Generation to Generation conference scheduled for next spring is currently underway. Those interested in becoming involved should call the Holocaust Remembrance Committee at (416) 635-2883 ext 144.

EMOTIONS RUN HIGH ON SPOTLIGHT MISSION

Visits to Yitzhak Rabin's grave and a joint Israeli-Palestinian patrol provided the high drama, but it was the emotional peaks that left a lasting impression on members of UJA Federation's Arts and Entertainment mission to Israel.

The Spotlight on Israel Mission, October 23-29, drew some of the leading names in Canada's arts & entertainment industry.

Other mission highlights included a border crossing from Metulla to Lebanon, a visit to the archaeological ruins at Beit She'an, Shabbat services at the kotel (Western Wall) and a visit to Kfar Gvirol, a UJA Federation Project Renewal neighbourhood.

The group also attended a reception at Jerusalem's Cinemateque theatre, visited the Rubin Academy for Music and heard an address by Jerusalem Mayor Ehud Olmert.

"It was a very emotional experience," says Howard Lichtman, who co-chairs UJA Federation's Arts & Entertainment Division with Richard Sadowski. "A real roller coaster from beginning to end."

REUNITING EX-MONTREALERS

Old friends and former schoolmates met again recently to relive good times at the first ever Maximum Montreal Reunion, sponsored by UJA Federation.

Close to 500 ex-Montrealers, looking for a familiar face from the past, packed the Bathurst Jewish Centre for an evening of nostalgia, schmoozing and, of course, fressing.

The event celebrated the strength and vibrancy of Montreal's Jewish community. "It was also an opportunity to welcome those who have moved to Toronto in recent years," explained event Chair Judy Engel.

These photos taken by Barry Shainbaum captured some memorable Montreal moments.

Right is not necessarily wrong, say Segal, Frum

By RON CSILLAG
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO – So what are two nice Jewish boys doing on Canada's right wing? Partly, trying to convince Jews there's nothing to fear.

JEWISH BOOK FAIR

David Frum, considered a conservative even in rightist circles, and Hugh Segal, a self-described "red, Bob Stanfield Tory," offered different visions of what conservatism means for Jews. But their message last week at Jewish Book Fair was that Jewish voters, who tend to lean toward liberalism, should give the right a try.

Speaking to about 200 people at Leah Posluns Theatre ("a large crowd for a federal Tory," Segal quipped) the two offered personal glimpses of what molded their outlooks.

Frum, author of two well-received books on the new right, conceded he did not learn his politics from his parents but from his surroundings. Whereas his parents reaped the rewards of hard work and family life, Frum said, he grew up witnessing the crumbling of the family and "despair, deficits, stagnating standards and the failure of governments to articulate a vision."

Frum feels Jews have "a national vice: a certain tendency to traditional liberalism." But he said he's found that liberalism is usually espoused by those Jews "who drift away from Judaism."

He said it's a good idea for Jews to remember that it's been the right that has been most supportive of Israel, and to look at Jewish migration patterns: "Where Jews want to go is pretty good. Where Jews leave is usually pretty bad," Frum said.

His brand of conservatism, he said, stands for the traditional family and intellectual and cultural standards.

Segal, a long time Tory insider and chief of staff to former prime minister Brian Mulroney, said his conservatism is "about ensuring that the mainstream is broad enough for one more person," a view likely tempered by his left-leaning father and socialist grandfather, and the "sense of community" he acquired at Montreal's Talmud Torah school.

He said he grew up admiring former prime minister John Diefenbaker because he stood up to Bay Street and checked reactionary elements in his party.

It was a Liberal government that sent shiploads of Jews away from Canadian shores during and after World War II, Segal noted, while a Tory government admitted Sri Lankan and other refugees.

His Tory heroes, he said, are former Alberta premier Peter Lougheed, former Ontario premier Bill Davis and one-time federal PC leader Bob Stanfield – all moderates. It was Davis, he noted, who refused to allow the PLO to attend an international conference in Toronto in 1974.

You tend to be a conservative "when you have a bias toward tradition and values." Segal said his brand of conservatism tends to follow "the European definition: it's more about order than freedom. No one's freedom is safe without order."

While Frum said he supports tax cuts in any circumstance and massive spending cutbacks to virtually all government programs, Segal said conservatives must not lose sight of "civility, respect and responsibility for each other."

The evening was moderated by Elaine Todres, Ontario's deputy soliticor general and deputy minister of correctional services – as she put it, "a nice Jewish girl in charge of police and jails."

Spanish Jews' plight explored

BY CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to the CJN

Simcha Jacobovici

TORONTO – Modern day descendants of Jews forcibly converted during the Spanish inquisition will be the topic of a special event at the Shaarei Shomayim Synagogue Nov. 30 at 8:30 p.m.

Co-sponsored by the Shaarei Shomayim Congregation and Netivot HaTorah Day School, the evening will kick off a year-long celebration of the 13th year since the founding of Netivot HaTorah Day School.

The program will feature Emmy award-winning documentary director and producer Simcha Jacobovici; guitarist Aaron Skitri; and Erna Paris, author of The End of Days, a story of the expulsion of Jews from Spain.

Jacobovici's film, Expulsion & Memory: Descendants of the Hidden Jews, which has received rave reviews, will be shown on three large screens in the synagogue sanctuary. The film tells the story of the conversos, who were forced to convert during the Spanish Inquisition, and looks at the memories that still haunt their descendants.

Shot on location in Spain, Portugal, Israel, Canada and the United States, the film has extensive interviews with the children of secret believers and features performances by Placido Domingo, Zubin Mehta and the Israel Philharmonic Orchestra.

Following the screening, Jacobovici will discuss the film and answer questions, Skitri will perform live and Paris will discuss her book, on which Jacobovici's film is based.

Rabbi Elliott Diamond, vice-principal of Netivot HaTorah, who is co-chair of the evening with his wife Rochelle, said the film "is fascinating. It shows the darker side of Jewish continuity. When you watch it, you sense a mystical quality of the Jewish people."

Tickets are available at the synagogue, Netivot HaTorah Day School and at Judaica stores.

Shalom's more than peace

By RABBI MARK FRIEDMAN

Although the Hebrew word, shalom is generally taken to mean peace, it can, in fact have several shades of meaning. Some of these are only indirectly related to what we think of as peace. Sometimes shalom implies calm, tranquility, the state of being undisturbed. This is the kind of serenity which one detects in people uninvolved with the problems that beset the community and the world. They are apathetic and unconcerned and therefore at peace.

We must decide whether we will imitate the hermit and seek peace only for ourselves. We can claim that we will let government officials alone take care of this and that we will just concern ourselves with our own houses, as Noah did with the ark. Or we can, as our tradition urges, oppose this doctrine of shalom elayich nafshi, of pursuing serenity for ourselves only. We can instead involve ourselves and make our voices heard for the sake of our entire world.

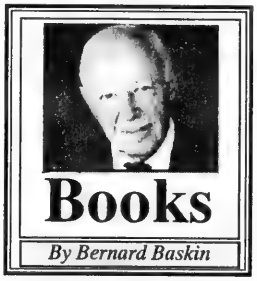
There is another type of peace. This is the peace synonymous with stagnation. This is the kind of peace one finds in the cemetery. The illustration of this kind of peace is the Dead Sea of Israel. If you have been to Israel, you know that the Dead Sea is a tranquil body of water, and due to the minerals it contains, one can float upon it easily. But it has no fish and other living creatures. Its waters cannot be consumed because they are poisoned. In fact, that is why it is known as the Dead Sea. It gets the water from the Jordan but does not share it with other rivers or streams. Since it has no outlets and gives nothing to other bodies of water, it is sterile and without vitality.

Yet, to the north of the Dead Sea is the Sea of Galilee. This sea is fresh. Fish swim in it and splashes of green adorn its banks. Men build their homes near it and every kind of life is happier because it is there. What is the difference between the two seas? The difference is that the Sea of Galilee receives but does not keep the Jordan. For every drop that flows into it, another drop flows out. The giving and receiving is in equal measure.

There is a third type of shalom. It has to do with a related word in Hebrew, slamut, which means wholeness and perfection. This word is applied to the patriarch Jacob, of whom we are reading in the Torah in the current series of sedrot. The Torah tells us that after his encounter with his brother Ksau, Vayavo Yeakov shalem ir Shchem – "Jacob came shalem to the city of Shohem." The rabbis comment on these words: Shalem be-qufo, shalem be-mamono, shalem be-Torato – physically healthy, financially secure and spiritually strong.

The true person of shalom, of peace is not the one who has a powerful roar and frightens others into submission through a show of power and force. Rather it is the person who can bring about a sweet harmony of cooperation. We need to search for that shalom which is shalem – which will create a symphony of goodwill and cooperation for all the inhabitants of our world and for all of their descendants.

Rabbi Friedman is the spiritual leader of Shaare Zedek Congregation in Montreal.



Power of the tongue

Words That Hurt; Words That Heal, by Joseph Telushkin (William Morrow & Co., $26.45).

The Hebrew word metzora, often found in the Hebrew scriptures, means "leper." The ancient rabbis read the term as two words, motzi ra, "He who spreads evil." Then they proceeded to denounce the sin of slander and malicious gossip as a loathsome moral disease, an evil to be as strenuously avoided as leprosy.

They also maintained that improper speech involving a third person besmirches three people: the one who speaks it, the one who accepts it and the one of whom it is spoken.

Rabbi Joseph Telushkin, in this volume that emphasizes the importance of speech in human relationships, asserts that it is easier to give up alcohol than to abandon our daily quota of verbal cruelties. It is no wonder that the Book of Proverbs warns that "life and death are in the power of the tongue."

Bismarck once said of his favorite general, "He can keep his mouth shut in seven different languages." The nicest thing about silence is that it can't be repeated. The worst thing about gossip is that once the harm has been done it is almost impossible to remedy.

A farmer who wanted to teach his son this lesson drove some nails into the side of a barn. Then he asked his son to remove them. After the boy had done so, the marks of the nails still remained. There was no way to get rid of the original impression of the nails. "So it is," said the father, "When we damage the reputation of others."

The tongue is in a very wet place and it is so easy for it to slip. And how often do we inflict with our tongue the kind of blows which burn deeper and hurt so much longer than any physical blows we can inflict.

Why do we gossip? Rabbi Telushkin believes that it is to raise our status through lowering the status of others. Evidently, there is psychological satisfaction in seeing the position or reputation of another suffer or decline.

The press is often guilty of ruining careers and even lives. The author presents the case of Oliver Stipple, who in 1975, saved the life of then president Gerald Ford from a demented gunman. Newspapers trumpeted that Stipple was active in gay causes. As a result his humiliated mother stopped talking to him. The erstwhile hero began to drink heavily and died a few years later at the age of 47. "The Stipple case demonstrates the inadvertant damage that can be done even when people start out talking positively about others. Unless we remain acutely conscious of the direction in which a conversation is heading, such talk is unlikely to remain innocuous."

In a chapter dealing with parents and children, the author suggests that when a child is caught in a lie, the untruth should be recognized but the child should not be branded a liar. Verbal assaults against children, and similar acts of humiliation can leave life long scars.

White lies, uttered for moral reasons are praised. The author points out that when a life is at stake, God not only permits lying, but even mandates it. For example when God commands the prophet Samuel to anoint David as king in place of Saul, Samuel refuses. He asks, "How can I go? If Saul hears about it, he will kill me." God then instructs the prophet to tell Saul a lie, that the purpose of his trip is not to anoint a new monarch, but to offer a sacrifice. Says Rabbi Telushkin, "Apparently God wishes to teach Samuel that one does not owe the truth to would-be murderers."

Replete with telling and pertinent illustrations as well as with insights from the well of Jewish tradition, this book is a wise and necessary call to watch our words. It is not a new admonition for, after all, three times a day in the liturgy we pray, "O God, keep my tongue from evil and my lips from speaking deceit."

E-mail lists, Usenet newsgroups can help you search family's past

BY MARK MIETKIEWICZ

In my previous column, we began to look at how the Internet can help us scale our Jewish family trees by using the World Wide Web's many genealogy sites. Today our hunt into the past continues and gets much more personal by using Usenet news groups and Internet e-mail lists. These tools can give you the ability to narrow your search to find out more about your own family and ancestral home town.

If your family once lived in a shtetl, why not join the ShtetLinks Project Mailing List [http://www.jewishgen.org/shtetlinks.html]? "The goal is to develop a kind of grassroots atlas of Jewish life, a resource for those seeking to know the stories of the cities, towns and villages where our ancestors lived."

And if you go to the JewishGen area on Special Interest Groups [http://www.jewishgen.org/sigs.html], you'll find links to the Yizkor Memorial Book list, the Russian Era Indexing of Poland Project and the Grodno and Latvia Special Interest Groups. Through mailing lists, you can develop associations, even friendships with people with similar interests around the world. JewishGen will even try to organize mentoring programs which help match novices with more experienced researchers [http://www.jewishgen.org/mentprog/mentor_p.htm].

If you have an e-mail account but do not have full Internet access, you can still be part of this Virtual Jewish Genealogical community. To get started, send separate e-mail messages to the following addresses.

(Note: your e-mails DO NOT need any subject or contents, just the address.) Messages to [faq@jewishgen.org] and [intro@jewishgen.org] will give you answers to the most Frequently Asked Jewish Genealogy Questions.

If you send a message to [begin@jewishgen.org] you will receive a 12-step Beginners Guide to Jewish Genealogy. And an e-mail to [info@jewishgen.org] will give you an index of all other genealogical documents which are available by e-mail.

Perhaps the most interesting place to browse for genealogical information on the Jewish Highway is at the Usenet newsgroup [soc.genealogy.jewish]. The contents of the newsgroup changes from day to day with a constant flow of requests, replies and recommendations.

Some recent examples:

• One man was looking for information about how to join the claim against Swiss banks holding money deposited by Jews before World War II.

• Some Israeli members were volunteering their services to look up names in local phone books.

• A success story told of how a daughter was reunited with her mother after being separated for 46 years. Apparently, the search involved over 900 e-mail messages and was aided by genealogical volunteers in the United States, Israel, Canada, Germany, Poland and Russia. Incredibly, the entire search took only four months.

So once you have actually tracked down a vital piece of information and have found names of those long-lost relatives that live somewhere out west, the next question is how do you track them down? There are a few Internet search programs which can be extremely useful helping you find relatives (and acquaintances) who may have e-mail addresses.

Some of these sites will even scour millions of Internet World Wide Web pages for those mention of those names. These programs are all free; so you can try: Okra net.citizen Directory Service [http://okra.ucr.edu/okra/], internet@ddress.finder [http://www.iaf.net/], Four11 [http://www.four11.com], and WhoWhere? [http://www.whowhere.com]

Some of these sites are particularly valuable because they will even let you search all U.S. telephone white pages on-line. Since the Internet is growing by the minute, these lists aren't exhaustive but they can be quite handy.

If all this searching has whetted your appetite, and you crave more human (as opposed to virtual) contact, then there's always the 16th Annual Summer Seminar on Jewish Genealogy to be held in Paris in the summer of 1997 [http://www.uniglobedynamic.com/paris97intro.html]. Who knows who you'll meet there.

March of the Living gives students 'hands on' learning

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO – As a secondary school teacher for the past 24 years, Stephen Bloom, head of the history department at Westmount Collegiate Institute, has found that students learn best from personal experience.

HOLOCAUST EDUCATION WEEK

His 17-year-old daughter Reissa, a Grade 12 student at Lawrence Park Collegiate Institute, discovered that for herself earlier this year as a participant on the March of the Living.

The pair spoke about Teaching the Holocaust through the Experiences of the March of the Living at a Holocaust Education Week program held at Congregation Darchei Noam.

The two-week biennial trip brings together Jewish teens from around the world to visit concentration camps and one-time major Jewish centres in Poland before finishing the trip in Israel. This year's group of over 5,000 included a Canadian contingent of about 300, including 112 from Toronto.

"I wanted to enhance my sense of Jewish identity," said Reissa, who attended Hebrew school at Adath Israel Congregation, and went on to lead youth services at Darchei Noam after her bat mitzvah.

As a student at a school with a predominantly non-Jewish student population, Reissa also wanted to connect with other Jewish teens.

Before going on the March, Reissa, whose mother has cousins who are survivors, didn't know very much about the Holocaust. "I learned through my father [a member of the Holocaust Education sub-committee], I learned a bit at Hebrew school and at school, but I'd never spoken to a survivor about his experience."

Initially a bit apprehensive, Reissa found that even before the trip began "our motto was, 'We are one,' and I think we really did feel that way."

Seeing the concentration camps evoked "an overwhelming sense of sadness. For me it represented the death of my people," Reissa said.

Despite the sadness and anger, there was also a strong sense of comfort and unity among the group, she said.

Roman Ziegler, a 69-year-old survivor and March chaperone, said he derived courage from the young people on the trip. "They went out of their way to prop us up."

The youngest of eight children, Ziegler was the sole survivor of his family. Because he is used to confronting his past as a speaker in local schools, he was unprepared for the emotional impact the trip would have on him.

"We have to challenge [Holocaust deniers]," he insists. "The legacy must be handed over to the younger generation."

The trip includes a life-affirming march from Auschwitz to Birkenau, marred for Reissa and her peers by the taunts of non-Jewish Poles. But "even with all the hatred, we felt really proud to be there."

Going to Israel was like coming home, said Reissa. "As we landed, everyone was incredibly happy. We started singing, dancing, kissing the ground. It was a joyous event.."

Her newly forged links with Jewish youth from around the world and with Israel have made Reissa "a very different person," said her father. "I know she will carry her experience with her the rest of her life and the story will be repeated so the event will never be forgotten.

"My own experience with Holocaust education over the last 18 years, fills me with a need to teach more, to make this generation more aware of the events that happened.. The outstanding part of the classroom experience for my students has always been the survivor speaker, but in the next 10 to 15 years, there will be very few left."

Kaplan Foundation scholarships awarded to four Jewish teens

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO – Four Jewish teens who last year attended schools in the riding of York Centre were among eight exceptional students presented with scholarships in the amount of $350.

Art Eggleton, member of Parliament for York Centre, presented Meny Grauman, Natan Kapustin, Leah Prusznowski and Neta Safirstein with Kaplan Foundation scholarships to recognize their academic achievement and community service.

The scholarships were provided by the Robert P. Kaplan Foundation, which was created out of the proceeds of a tribute dinner held in honor of Bob Kaplan, former MP for York Centre.

Grauman, 18, a recent graduate of the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto (CHAT) has enrolled in the University of Toronto's history program. A founding member of a youth program at Beth Avraham Yosef of Toronto Congregation, he also served as a news editor for CHAT's school paper and captain of the school trivia team for three years.

Kapustin, 18, a graduate of Yeshivat Or Chaim, is now studying at Yeshivat Sha'alvim in Israel. He plans to return to Toronto next year and study at York University.

Kapustin was head of the Bnei Akiva group at B'nai Torah Congregation and read Torah regularly at Kehillat Shaarei Torah. He also served as president of his school's student council last year.

"These young people have done a great deal in their young lives. Their skills and talents are examples that we can all follow," said Eggleton. "They are our future leaders."

Women share experiences on how Holocaust has shaped their lives

By CINDY WAXER
Special to the CJN

TORONTO – An intensive day-long workshop during Holocaust Education Week provided an opportunity for women to share their personal Holocaust experiences.

HOLOCAUST EDUCATION WEEK

The Daughters of Holocaust Survivors Workshop, held at the Bloor JCC, was organized by Helena Feinstadt and Sandra Finkelman, both psychotherapists in private practice and daughters of Holocaust survivors.

The event was attended by 12 women, who were divided into groups and/or pairs. Participants then discussed how being raised in a Holocaust family has affected their history, present-day relationships, partnerships, friendships, parenting skills and identity as women.

"Our main agenda was to create an opportunity for women to share and connect with each other and to have a validation of their experiences," said Finkelman.

In addition to providing a forum for daughters of Holocaust survivors to share experiences, the workshop addressed the complex issues unique to these women and their situations.

"We have found women raised in a Holocaust family tend to have or feel the major responsibility of care taking, especially for aging parents," Feinstadt said. They also tend to place others' needs before their own, to have unreasonably high expectations of themselves and to question how to bestow the legacy of the Holocaust upon their children, she added.

"I think for some women, there's been a real struggle around how much to share, what to share and in what way to share because they don't want their kids to be traumatized," Finkelman said.

To alleviate those concerns, Feinstadt and Finkelman tried to ensure that the workshop's open dialogue and writing exercises equipped women with the tools necessary for self-empowerment.

"We wanted it to be a combination of looking at some of the difficulties and the struggles, and also to focus on the positive, on what we've gained, the strengths of ourselves, the strengths of our parents," Feinstadt said.

In fact, many children of Holocaust survivors invest their strengths in social activism, a commitment she said can be attributed to a highly-developed sense of compassion for others. And it was their own capacity for empathy that contributed to Feinstadt and Finkelman's decision to practise psychotherapy.

"Our ability to have compassion, as daughters of Holocaust survivors, is so heightened that I think that's a real asset in terms of working as therapists," Finkelman said.

Weisfeld was a leading philanthropist

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Louis Weisfeld, a businessman and philanthropist known for his support of Jewish education, died last week at the age of 90.

Weisfeld, a sportswear manufacturer who branched out into building and development, was a member of the board of Associated Hebrew Schools for more than 50 years, serving in almost every capacity. He was chairman of the board for 18 years and chaired the scholarship committee until his death.

He joined the board in 1944, the year his son, Moshe Yosef (now deceased) began attending the school. When Associated paid tribute to Weisfeld on his 90th birthday in September for a lifetime of dedication to the school, he said in an interview that he initially became involved to make a contribution as parent.

"I felt that if I sent my son, then I should be giving all the help I could. It was really an honor to be a member of the board," he said at that time.

"He helped to create and develop Associated to what it is today," said Sheldon Goodman, the president of the school, noting that Weisfeld played an instrumental role in its growth from one campus to four.

"He gave freely of his time and of his money to the school on behalf of the entire community. He was always a staunch supporter of Jewish education for everyone regardless of their means," Goodman said.

"Louis was dedicated to Jewish education. He believed that the future of Judaism lay with the children and he devoted himself to their education," said Harold Dessen, a past president of Associated.

Known for his generosity, Weisfeld supported a broad spectrum of Jewish institutions, including Bar-Ilan and Hebrew universities, Beth Tzedec Congregation, Shaarei Shomayim Synagogue, Lubavitch and UJA. He also funded the translation of several volumes of Steinsaltz Talmud.

Weisfeld is survived by Gabi, his wife of 25 years; daughter and son-in-law Tracey and Gilad Abrahami, and their three children, Reuven, Devin and Alissa Miriam.

Cupid plays matchmaker for Bernard Betel volunteers

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO – Cupid's arrow has struck two volunteers at Bernard Betel Centre, Jean Cooper, 71, and Morris Bader, 82. They are leaving for Florida together Nov. 28.

"My wife Sue [Cohen] died last December and I became terribly depressed ," said Bader. "We had a good life together for 56 years."

He decided to seek help at the Bernard Betel Centre, and staffer Anna Halber referred him to Cooper, a volunteer who had also gone through a difficult period when she lost her husband, Louis, 91, three years ago.

Cooper visits five elderly women twice a week, sometimes taking them out for coffee. One of the women, though blind, has become a telephone volunteer herself.

Cooper and Halber helped Bader with his first visits as a volunteer, and after two or three cases which did not work out, Bader is now regularly visiting George Gluckschneider, 82, a Holocaust survivor.

But, just as important, Cooper and Bader found they were attracted to each other.

"She literally saved my life," said Bader of his new friend. "She took over, does the shopping and handles my mail."

Cooper and her husband were married for 40 years and were both members of Bernard Betel.

"He asked me to be a volunteer at the centre because he knew I would be lonely. I was terribly depressed, but the centre got me busy and volunteering has saved my life," she says.

At one time a milkman for Alliance Dairy who used a horse and wagon on his route, Bader is a native of Poland who came to Canada at a young age. Later he was one of the organizers of a union for Alliance drivers, winning them rubber boots in a new contract. He operated a confectionery store at Bloor and Havelock streets before going into the building business.

"Thank goodness I'm in a solid position financially," he said.

On one of his first visits to Gluckschneider, Bader went to a pharmacy to replenish the former's supply of heart pills. When Gluckschneider, who lost his wife nine years ago, is up to it, he takes him for a drive.

With many of their volunteers heading south, the centre is seeking new people of all ages who will visit housebound seniors or have regular telephone chats with them.

"Winter is a tough time for many seniors and it is often just as beneficial for the volunteer as for the person visited, said Ruth Cohen of the centre's volunteer outreach services.

For information on becoming a volunteer, or if you know of a senior who could benefit from outreach services, call Halber at 416-225-2112.

Swastika drawn on court order

OAKVILLE, Ont. – New charges are being considered against a man for scrawling a swastika beside his signature on a court order after he was convicted of attacking a black shopkeeper.

Last month, Craig Harrison, 30, was sentenced to two years less a day in jail for beating up a Georgetown merchant. Following his sentencing, Harrison yelled racial epithets as he was being escorted from court, and later drew a small swastika next to his name on a probation form.

Halton Crown attorney Brian O'Malley told The CJN that a contempt of court charge against Harrison is being weighed.

"We're exploring our options. We want to take our time. The last thing we want to do is pick the wrong charge."

The Crown is considering a contempt charge against Harrison for conduct that "scandalizes" the court, O'Malley said, adding he was "shocked" by the swastika's appearance on the document.

Evidence showed that Harrison assaulted the Jamaican-born merchant after yelling racial slurs at him. A forensic psychiatrist described Harrison as a severe psychopath with a history of racist behavior. The Crown referred to him as extremely dangerous and noted he has previous criminal convictions for assault causing bodily harm.

Remembrance Day program held

By JOEL JACOBSON
CJN Atlantic Correspondent

HALIFAX – Canadians must always stand on guard against inaction and intolerance by its people, and maintain the right to ask for action from governments to prosecute violators, says Jon Goldberg, executive director, Atlantic Jewish Council (AJC).

Speaking to more than 200 people at Dignity Day ceremonies in Halifax's Grand Parade at City Hall, Goldberg said alleged Nazi war criminals have found a haven in Canada. He called on officials to expel those still in the country, "to honor those who fought for our country against the Nazis in World War II.

"If we don't use the legal opportunities available to us against these alleged criminals, we are telling other war criminals, from Bosnia, Rwanda and other countries they are welcome to our shores."

The large crowd at the sixth annual Dignity Day program organized by the AJC attracted many non-Jewish participants, including the lieutenant governor, several members of Parliament, members of the provincial Legislative Assembly, city councillors and clergy from Protestant and Catholic congregations. Veterans and legion members of all faiths were also in attendance.

"I was impressed with the turnout of people from all sectors of the community," said Goldberg. "I wanted to take the opportunity to remind them of the need to combat racial intolerance. We're not without it in Halifax, but, compared to other communities in Atlantic Canada and the country, our multicultural efforts have gone a long way toward understanding."

In one of the speeches made by members of the Atlantic Canada Jewish Students Federation, Dana Newman recalled the history of Kristallnacht, which the evening commemorated, citing the Night of Broken Glass, Nov. 9, 1938, as the night 191 synagogues were destroyed in Germany, 7,500 shops looted and 91 people killed.

"And within a week, Jewish children were barred from public schools and soon the extermination camps opened," she said.

Rev. Donald Fairfax, a black minister representaing the clergy of Nova Scotia, called for "value of the dignity of mankind. May we never forget those who proclaimed justice, peace and freedom. We must affirm those qualities for which our loved ones gave their lives."

Museum honors wartime heroism

By RON CSILLAG
CJN Staff Reporter

OTTAWA – Anna Heilman's long quest to have her sister recognized for her wartime heroism has finally born fruit. But there's still a snag.

Heilman, an Ottawa Holocaust survivor, recently travelled to Washington to accept the United States Holocaust Memorial Museum's prestigious Medal of Resistance, awarded posthumously to her sister, Ester Wajcblum, who was publicly hanged at Auschwitz for helping destroy a crematorium during the 1944 prisoners' uprising at the camp.

Heilman has spent the last eight years trying to win recognition for her sister and two other women for their role in the sabotage. The three aren't as well-known as Roza Robota, a young woman tortured and hanged for helping to smuggle gunpowder to the resistance inside the Auschwitz-Birkenau complex, but Wajcblum, Ala Gertner and Regina Safirsztajn were also hanged the same day for their role in the revolt, in which Crematorium No. 4 was blown up and disabled on Oct. 7, 1944. The sabotage probably saved thousands who would have ended up in the ovens.

Robota had help from dozens of inmates, among them Heilman. But the Nazis condemned just the four women, and hanged them before 2,000 female prisoners on Jan. 5, 1945.

It was the last public execution at Auschwitz. The death camp was liberated by the Red Army just three weeks later.

Friends of Heilman pushed her to the back of the throng, preventing her from seeing the hanging. But even today, she can hear the moans from the crowd as the scaffolds gave way.

Heilman's lobbying has paid off. A monument to the four women was dedicated at Yad Vashem in 1991. Two years ago, the Polish government, at its expense, unveiled a plaque at Auschwitz dedicated to Jewish heroism and paying tribute to the four.

And while she's thankful that the heroines have been honored by Washington's renowned Holocaust museum, Heilman is hurt that in the museum's permanent exhibit on the Auschwitz uprising, while noting the role of all four women, only a photograph of Robota is displayed.

"This is very difficult for me to accept," she told The CJN, her voice choking slightly. "There are so few documented instances of Jewish resistance in the camps. I want photographs of all four displayed, but the museum has refused."

A small exhibit on the four heroines, with photographs of three of them, including Wajcblum, will appear only in the museum's Miles Lerman Centre for the Study of Jewish Resistance.

Three of the four young women – girls, really – worked in the camp's munitions factory. From there, they smuggled minute amounts of gunpowder into neighboring Birkenau. Heilman helped transfer the packets from the women's barracks to the men's, while Robota worked with the resistance.

"We all knew we would be killed if we were caught," said Heilman, now 68. "But we knew we might die anyway, so we thought we would at least die for something."

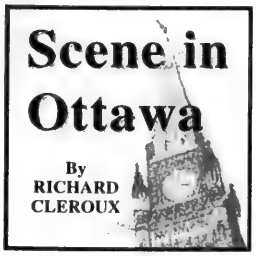
FTA's passage in Commons was not a smooth ride



OTTAWA – Bill C-61 ratifying the Canada-Israel free trade agreement passed through the Commons unanimously on Nov. 6, but the official record doesn't tell the whole story.

It wasn't that easy.

It passed all right, but not without a lot of pushing and shoving behind the scenes and no small amount of lobbying.

In the process some nasty things were said on the floor of the Commons about Israel and the treatment of the Palestinian minority.

Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu took the worst of it. Suffice it to say he didn't come out as next in line for a Nobel Peace Prize.

Right now the agreement is before the Senate, where a group of senators, not particularly known for their love of Israel, could turn it into a three-ring circus.

If they can prevent the agreement from being adopted during the next three weeks, in time for the original implementation date of Jan. 1, 1997, the delay would be a minor victory of sorts for them.

There was plenty of action in the Commons when the deal was debated there on Nov. 5. But most of it went unreported. It was overshadowed that day by the resignation of the Quebec lieutenant governor over Nazi sympathies he had during World War II.

Reform MP Keith Martin presented an amendment to hold up the free trade deal indefinitely until Israel improves its treatment of Palestinians.

His amendment was voted down overwhelmingly, but not before Martin said for the record what he thinks of Netanyahu and Israel's Likud government, which it turned out, wasn't much.

"The bulk of what has taken place (in Israel) recently falls squarely on the shoulders of Mr. Netanyahu and his Likud party.

"If he believes that the Palestinian people will somehow capitulate to a stronger Israel ... and that they will back down, he is dead wrong.

"History has proven that the Palestinian people will not back down until their demands are met."

Strong words indeed.

Martin has a plan for peace in the Middle East which involves bringing Syrian President Hafez al-Assad into the talks, moving the settlers out of the settlements and ending the border closures. He also has a plan for Jerusalem.

"I would propose as a Roman Catholic that Jerusalem be made an international site for the religions of the world. No one single nation, no one single religion is to have control over this sensitive site...controlled, organized and guarded by the United Nations. I cannot see anything short of that taking place."

The amendment and the plan were voted down, overwhelmingly.

Martin said afterwards he understood why so many Liberal backbenchers, whom he believes are secretly on his side, had voted against his amendment: "There was heavy pressure from the Prime Minister's Office to push the deal through."

Government insiders admit privately that Commons MPs and the general public were deliberately kept in the dark about the trade deal while it was being negotiated between Israeli and Canadian government officials during the past year.

The Liberal government feared that if the public got wind of the deal before it was signed, there would be so much political opposition to it, for reasons that had nothing to do with economics, that it would never be approved, regardless of how good a deal it might be for both countries.

No sense letting politics get in the way of a good deal.

That's why many MPs and other Canadians first heard of the deal when Israeli Trade Minister Natan Sharansky showed up in Toronto one day in July to sign the agreement.

For almost a year, without fanfare, members of the Jewish and Arab Canadian business communities were quietly and extensively consulted and brought in regularly for briefings at Foreign Affairs headquarters in Ottawa. The government knew it could count on the support of these businesspeople because they stood to gain the most from a Canada-Israel free trade agreement.

The bureaucrats did their homework well. There was not a word of opposition about the free trade deal this week or last from either Arab or Jewish-Canadian business communities.

Martin says he was surprised the Bloc Québécois didn't vote against Bill C-61 given its historic support of the Palestinian cause.

Behind the scenes, that work had been done there too.

When a Bloc Québécois MP complained earlier this year that a big swimwear manufacturer in his riding would take a hard blow from Israeli competition, a special clause was inserted to continue duties on all Israeli swimwear for another 2½ years. In return duties will remain on Canadian cotton exports.

The Jewish lobby in Ottawa, the Canada-Israel Committee (CIC), deserves some credit too.

Over the past three years, and often despite fierce criticism from within the Canadian Jewish community, it regularly organized junkets to Israel for Bloc Québécois MPs, even for some who had not been particularly friendly to Israel.

The CIC idea was to show the separatist MPs firsthand (at no expense to them) that Israel might not be so terrible after all.

Bloc MPs Francine Lalonde, Pauline Picard, Gilles Duceppe, Yvan Loubier, Michel Bellehumeur, and Christine Gagnon were among the Bloc MPs who went on free trips.

During the Bill C-61 debate, they showed a more sophisticated approach to Middle East problems. At least none of them proposed giving Jerusalem over to the United Nations. And they voted for the deal. They were there when it counted...for Canada and for Israel.

Now for the next round in the Senate.

Torah tape library opens doors in Ottawa

By MIRIAM VALE
CJN Correspondent

OTTAWA – Shannon Gordon, a 14-year-old student at the Ottawa Torah Institute, says he enjoys his weekly visits to the Jewish Youth Library to read books on topics ranging from kashrut to the observance of Shabbat.

Now, in addition to reading about Jewish culture, library patrons will be able to listen to this information, because more tapes about Jewish life and religion are being added to the library's collection in early December.

Gordon recently spoke to an audience of more than 140 at the opening of the Jarvis Freedman Torah Tape Library.

The audio collection will be one of the biggest in Canada and possibly North America, says Devora Caytak, who co-founded the library with her husband Joseph in 1983.

She says there will be 5,000 tapes in the collection, including the 700 tapes already available, because donations totalling $10,000 have been made by the Canadian Jewish community, adding that the tapes will advance Jewish education.

"A person wants to become more literate in Judaism and now they will have the opportunity," says Caytak. "While they're going to work in the car, they could put a tape on and learn to read Hebrew, learn how to run a Passover seder and learn about our Jewish heritage."

Born in 1935, Jarvis Freedman spent his life helping raise funds for local Jewish organizations. He belonged to every synagogue in the city and helped found the Ottawa Torah Institute in 1980.

Since Freedman's death in 1980, a Judaic studies research library at the Beth Avraham Yoseph Synagogue in Thornhill, Ont., was also established in his honor.

Jacob Freedman, one of Freedman's children who currently resides in Toronto, says this tribute is especially fitting for his father.

"Father had a sense of community," says Freedman. "This would be most appropriate from his perspective, because this library is meant to serve the Ottawa community at large and not only a tiny portion of the community."

Caytak says the Freedman family also made a sizeable donation to the library that bought a huge storage cabinet for the tapes and a high-speed tape copier.

Keynote speaker at the opening, Rabbi Baruch Taub, rabbi at Beth Avraham Yoseph Synagogue, said the history of Jewish survival depends on the survival of Jewish literature and culture. He said Jewish aggressors, like the Nazis, destroyed books as a means of destroying Judaism.

Windsor JCC gets face lift

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

WINDSOR – A $2-million renovation of the Windsor Jewish Community Centre is to be celebrated Nov. 23 with a gala and dinner, followed by a ribbon cutting Sunday afternoon to culminate the dedication weekend.

Although the community has dwindled from 850 families in 1959 when the centre started, to 1,700 individuals today, there is optimism that the decline has stopped and that young famlies are moving in, said the centre's executive director Steve Brownstein.

"After all, Windsor is a viable alternative. We have no traffic jams," said Brownstein

The 30,000-square-foot centre had little more than a new coat of paint until the community decided in the early 1990s that it was time for a renaissance, and then a provincial grant got the ball rolling.

The renovated centre has a new library lounge with a blue-ribbon collection of Jewish books and connections to the Internet. The board room, meeting rooms, the lobby and the gym/auditorium have all been improved, as has the health club. One feature is a newly renovated youth lounge with a pool table and video games.

The centre is also celebrating the 40th anniversary of its day camp.

For information about the gala dinner, which includes a live band, cocktails and dinner for $50 per person call 519-973-1772.

Intensive talks underway to free Ron Arad

By DOUGLAS DAVIS
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM – Intense negotiations appear to be under way between Israel and Hezbollah via German Intelligence chief Bernd Schmidbauer, for the release of missing IAF navigator Ron Arad.

A report last week in London's Independent said two Lebanese government officials flew to Germany last weekend with Arad's fingerprints, which would be passed on to Israel.

The report said Schmidbauer had already delivered a letter purported to have been written by Arad, but the Israeli officials insisted on seeing further "signs of life."

"We are full of hope and as always our position is that Ron Arad and the other missing soldiers are alive until proven otherwise," Defence Minister Yitzhak Mordechai said.

"We are constantly looking everywhere for anything possible in order to find out what happened to Ron Arad. We don't have anything for certain. There are things we have read and heard and we are trying to confirm them any way we can," Mordechai told reporters in Beersheva.

Earlier, the Beirut daily An-Nahar reported that Arad would be released soon in exchange for more than 100 Lebanese prisoners held at the South Lebanese Army's Khiam Jail and in Israeli jails.

Those held in Israel include Abdel Karim Obeid, a Hezbollah cleric captured by Israeli commandos in 1989, and Mustafa Dirani, who is said to have headed the Lebanese Shi'ite group that held Arad for some time and who was captured in 1994.

The Beirut paper quoted Lebanese security sources as saying Schmidbauer met Hezbollah spiritual leader Sheikh Hassan Nasrallah last month and "received Hezbollah's conditions for seriously seeking Arad's whereabouts and settling the issue definitively."

They said Schmidbauer would return to Beirut after conveying Hezbollah's terms to Israel.

The sources also confirmed that the Iranians had become a party to the issue and were seeking information about the fate of four Iranian diplomats who were allegedly kidnapped by Lebanese Christian forces in 1982.

There is speculation that, as part of the deal, the Syrians are demanding an Israeli withdrawal from south Lebanon.

In July, Schmidbauer brokered an exchange of bodies and prisoners between Hezbollah and Israel which resulted in the return of the remains of Yosef Fink and Rahamim Alsheikh, two IDF soldiers who were kidnapped and murdered in the security zone in February 1986. Sources in London said that the Germans were anxious to succeed in freeing Arad as proof to Washington that the European policy of "critical dialogue" with Iran is working.

At the same time, they say, both Iran and Syria are seeking to demonstrate flexibility to the recently re-elected Clinton administration.

Iran wants to pacify an increasingly hostile U.S. Congress, while Syria is anxious to demonstrate to a new secretary of state that it is a serious player and should be removed from the State Department's list of terror sponsors.

Arad was captured in October 1986 after he and his pilot bailed out of their nonfunctioning Phantom jet over south Lebanon. The pilot escaped by holding onto the skids of an IAF rescue helicopter, but Arad was captured just seconds before he could reach the helicopter. Hezbollah declined to comment on the report about Arad.

"We do not have anything to say on this subject," a Hezbollah spokesperson told Reuters by telephone.

High Court ruling limits rabbinical courts' authority

By EVELYN GORDON
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM – In a precedent-setting decision, the High Court of Justice ruled last week that rabbinical courts do not have the right to impose sanctions on religious Jews who refuse to accept their rulings in civil suits.

This is the most significant challenge to the rabbinical courts' authority since early 1994, when the High Court ordered them to use civil law rather than Halachah to determine property settlements in divorce cases. As such, it raised an outcry from the religious sector.

"In all religious matters that have come before the High Court recently, the 'surprising' split [in the verdicts] has been between religious and secular justices. This shows that the justices rule not according to legal principles but according to their world view," said MK Avraham Ravitz (UTJ), who added that the religious parties would initiate legislation to correct this change in the status quo.

"But this is the first time the High Court has interfered in the lives of the religious community independent of the [demands of the] secular community," he said.

However, as Justice Zvi Tal noted in his dissenting opinion, it is doubtful that the court's ruling will have any practical impact, since the sanctions imposed by the rabbinical courts in these cases – ostracism and excommunication – are implemented not by the state but by the religious community itself.

The court was ruling on three petitions. One was by Yosef Katz, who refused to allow the Jerusalem Rabbinical Court to settle a slander suit against him. The court issued a statement that Katz had refused to submit to its judgment, without imposing sanctions, but Katz said that labelling him as someone who refused a Torah judgment is in itself disgraceful among the religious community.

The second petition, by MK Ran Cohen (Meretz), was due to the Beersheva Rabbinical Court's decision to have a Netivot contractor named Yitzhak Sofer ostracized because of his refusal to allow the court to settle a financial dispute with a client. This meant that religious Jews would not count him in a minyan, educate his children, hire him or give him a Jewish burial.

The third petition was by Yanon Zaribi, a Haifa city councillor from the National Religious Party, who refused to let the Haifa Rabbinical Court adjudicate a dispute with Agudat Yisrael over who should get the council seat under an agreement between the two parties. The court then instructed religious Jews to keep him out of public life.

Justices Yitzhak Zamir and Dalia Dorner, with Tal dissenting, said the rabbinical courts had no authority to issue any of these decisions.

However, a rabbinical court has no authority in other civil disputes unless both sides accept it as an arbitrator, and then it would be subject to the Arbitration Law. This law states that no one can be forced to accept an arbitrator against his will, nor can sanctions be imposed on someone who refuses to accept the arbitrator's decision, even if he initially agreed to the arbitration.

Even in those areas where the rabbinical courts do have enforceable authority, the law does not allow them to use ostracism and excommunication as sanctions, Zamir added.

Zamir and Dorner also rejected the idea that Jewish law gives the rabbinical courts the right to use such sanctions. These sanctions have existed in Jewish law since Talmudic times, Zamir said, and it might be that a private rabbinical court such as that of the Eda Haredit would still be legally justified in applying them. However, he said, the rabbinical courts are state institutions and are therefore bound by the law of the land and cannot employ powers the law has not given them.

Tal, in his dissent, argued that the state did not create the rabbinical courts; it merely conferred official status on existing courts in the limited matter of personal status. In all other respects, he said, these courts continue to be what they were: Fully functioning courts with the full range of powers granted by Jewish law. If they did not have these powers, Tal said, these courts would have no halachic standing in marriage and divorce and would therefore be useless to the state.

Sephardi Chief Rabbi Eliahu Bakshi-Doron said that to his sorrow the High Court of Justice had interfered in a matter which was clearly one of Halachah and said that the religious establishment would find a way to deal with this matter.

WWII hideout found in Amsterdam

By RUBEN E. VIS
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

AMSTERDAM – In a story that brings Anne Frank to mind, a new owner of an Amsterdam apartment recently discovered a hiding area above a closet that apparently was used during the Holocaust.

The apartment owner also found various items in the space that had not been touched in about 50 years.

The items included a mattress and copies of a German medical magazine from 1942 and 1943.

A German Jew may have hidden in the apartment, given the type of objects found and the location of the apartment, said a staff member of a museum here about the Resistance.

The apartment is located in an area where many Jews lived before World War II.

Efforts are under way to locate the person who hid here, but sources said the person probably did not survive the Holocaust.

Speaking to the full assembly plenary by live satellite feed on last Thursday night, Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu promised delegates that "we will adamantly refuse to make any changes affecting conversions in the United States and the Diaspora. I will stand in the breach myself." He had been scheduled to attend the conference, but was held back due to the delicate, pressing stage of negotiations on the deployment of the IDF from Hebron.

The tone of the evening was set by Rabbi Sheldon Zimmerman, president of Hebrew Union College. In his d'var Torah, he called for intra-Jewish reconciliation, for mutual respect for a Jewish people that is "diverse but united, different but together. If we can meet with our Arab brothers and sisters," the rabbi rhetorically stated, "we can surely meet with our Jewish brothers and sisters too."

To thundering applause on last Friday afternoon, leader of the opposition Shimon Peres echoed the theme. "We have to unite our people", he said, "even though it does not mean agreement on all issues. There are 70 faces to the Torah. Each is valid. We are pluralistic enough to have a democracy; but we have to have a democracy that allows our differences: the right to be equal and the equal right of every person to be different."

Earlier in the week, at the outset of the assembly the CJF board of governors passed a resolution urging the government of Israel and the Knesset "to abstain from amending legislation, or passing any new legislation that would change the current situation regarding recognition of conversions."

To underscore the gravity with which the CJF leadership views the unfolding political situation, the resolution also "urged the leaders of Israel not to underestimate the strength of feeling on this matter, and its detrimental effect on Jewish unity and Israel-Diaspora relations."

Though pluralism dominated the week's proceedings, other important business was also included in the agenda. Charles Bronfman took the spotlight during the Thursday evening plenary session to announce the inauguration of Israel Experience Incorporated. In an emotional appeal to the delegates, Bronfman called out to the delegates: "I ask you, I plead with you, send your children to Israel in an educational experience that will change their lives. The unity of the Jewish people, whose soul is in Jerusalem, depends upon it."

The Israel Experience is to be housed at the CJF, with the partnership of the UJA in the United States, the UIA in Canada, the CRB Foundation, the JAFI and the Ministry of Tourism in Israel, and will channel its energies at trying to ensure that every Jewish youngster between the ages of 13 to 18 who wishes to go on an educational summer program to Israel, will be able to do so.

The Israel Experience is seen by the CJF leadership as the centrepiece in the Jewish educational effort aimed at Jewish youth. Speaking to the assembly, Harvey Wolfe, chair of UIA-Canada declared: "We pledge that the younger generation of Canadian Jews will know Israel and love Israel as we do."

The CJF provides Canadian and American federations with essential services that attempt to strengthen local programs and enhance fund raising ability. There are 189 federations throughout North America. Each year, the federations gather in an assembly to exchange views, share ideas, and plan for the collective future of the federation movement across the Diaspora. Last week's assembly was the 65th such meeting. Dr. Conrad Giles, of Detroit, Michigan was elected president of the CJF.

Richard Vineberg, president of CJF- Canada, told The CJN he felt that this year's assembly demonstrated 'tremendous spirit" and was a wonderful opportunity for Canadians to get together to discuss important issues.

Of the 3,000 delegates and participants who attended the assembly, 160 were from Canada. There were a number of sessions with specifically-oriented Canadian themes.

The "excitement" during the five-day program did not only spring from the deliberations inside the conference hall.

Last Wednesday evening's plenary was halted in mid-session as a result of a bomb threat that Seattle police received. Delegates quickly evacuated the building.

Thursday evening's program was accompanied by three separate, noisy and competing demonstrations outside the conference centre. And on Friday afternoon, the police cordoned off a large section of the area near the centre for almost an hour to investigate a suspicious box that had been left nearby.

Chemical weapons

"I didn't say this. On the contrary. We are looking for every way to reach a dialogue. We were talking of what would happen if [Syria] implemented their threat. I said that if they did, then we have the might to severely harm anyone who strikes us and this blow would obviously put the regime at risk," Mordechai said.

In an interview with the Sunday Times, Mordechai had said that Russian scientists were helping Syria develop lethal nerve gases. These include VX, one of the most toxic nerve agents, said Mordechai in the interview, his first with a Western newspaper.

A minute quantity of VX on exposed skin can kill within seconds. Unlike other nerve gases, VX can persist as a deadly agent for days or weeks.

In his Israel Radio interview. Mordechai confirmed the report. "I hope that they will never use it, definitely not against us. But we cannot ignore it," Mordechai said.

Mordechai was quoted in the Sunday Times as saying the Syrians have "several hundred Scud missiles with the capability of reaching every part of Israel. It is these Scud missiles that would be used to carry the nerve gas in specially adapted warheads to centres of Israeli population."

Defence sources say the Syrian Scud Bs are capable of carrying a 1,000-kilo warhead up to 300 kilometres and the Scud Cs a 770- kilo warhead up to 500 kilometres, thus putting virtually all of Israel under Syrian missile threat. This also includes the nuclear research facility at Dimona in the Negev.

The Week in Israel

Nov. 11

• Defence Minister Yitzhak Mordechai told the media that security forces believe a soldier who has been missing since September was kidnapped. Sharon Edri, 19, was last seen Sept. 11, at an army base in central Israel.

Nov. 12

• The Supreme Court postponed a decision on the fate of several adopted children who have undergone conversions by the Masorti movement which represents Conservative Jews in Israel. Meanwhile, the movement said it received almost a dozen death threats from Brit Ka'anim, a religious extremist organization. The threats came after Masorti placed ads in newspapers urging public support for non-Orthodox conversions in Israel.

• Chief Sephardi Rabbi Eliahu Bakshi-Doron told settlers they should evacuate Hebron if Israel could no longer guarantee their safety. "Preservation of life supercedes everything, including the religious commandment to settle the land."

• The government announced two new cabinet appointments: Tsachi Hanegbi was named justice minister and Yehoshua Matza was named health minister.

Nov. 13

• In an appearance before the Knesset education committee the head of the IDF's personnel branch, Gen. Gideon Sheffer, criticized the late prime minister Yitzhak Rabin and Shimon Peres for contributing to the lack of motivation in the army. Among other things, he said the former government was too quick to grant exemptions from service.

• The trial of Nahum Kurman opened in Jerusalem District Court. Kurman was charged with manslaughter in the death of an 11-year-old Palestinian boy.

Nov. 14

• Finance Minister Dan Meridor said the regional economic conference in Cairo was more successful from a business perspective than previous conferences in the region.

Nov. 15

• Israel's High Court of Justice agreed to allow the Shin Bet, to use physical force in the interrogation of an Islamic Jihad detainee.

Cairo Conference

Economics and politics: an inextricable link

By SHELDON KIRSHNER

Mideast Analysis

The third Middle East economic conference, held in Cairo last week, attracted a sizeable Israeli delegation, as well as several thousand entrepreneurs, diplomats and officials from 92 countries.

The forum – a spinoff of Israel's 1993 historic rapprochement with the PLO – took place at a critical juncture, when the future of the Mideast peace process is somewhat cloudy and Israel's relations with the Arab world are in sharp decline.

Israel is learning that there is an inextricable link between economics and politics. "Without progress in the peace process, we cannot have a flourishing economy," warned Eitan Raff, chair of Bank Leumi, recently.

Benjamin Gaon, chief executive officer of the Israeli congolomerate Koor Industries, was even more emphatic. "Israel's emerging economy," he declared in no uncertain terms, "cannot proceed without the peace process."

Shimon Peres, the former Israeli prime minister, envisaged a New Middle East in which Israel and its Arab neighbors would forge real economic partnerships, create open borders and a measure of shared prosperity, and push the region beyond the spectre of war as a means to resolve disputes.

For a while, as the peace process registered steady progress and optimism reigned, Peres' vision seemed reasonable and even attainable. It appeared as if Israel was on the verge of an economic boom, fueled in part by increasing trade with its Arab neighbors.

At the first economic Middle East conference in Casablanca, Morocco, the Gulf states abolished the secondary and tertiary boycott against Israel, a development widely regarded as a harbinger of Israel's eventual integration into the region.

As the boycott collapsed, Israel expanded its relations with Asian countries, notably Japan and India, which had been reluctant to enter into significant trade arrangements with the Jewish state.

Amid this atmosphere, foreign investors flocked to Israel in record numbers. Investments increased from $800 million (US) in 1994 to $2.2 billion last year.

And in the wake of last year's conference in Amman, Israel upgraded its economic links with Egypt and Jordan.

But with the election of a right-wing government in Israel, led by Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu, a man who wants to liberalize the Israeli economy, the march toward a New Middle East was stopped almost dead in its tracks.

Netanyahu's policies – his skepticism of the land-for-peace formula and of the Oslo agreements, his opposition to a Palestinian state, his resolve to expand Jewish settlements in the territories and his cold reserve toward PLO chair Yasser Arafat – antagonized Arab states and the Palestinians.

As a result of these developments, Israel's Arab partners in peace, egged on in particular by Syria, effectively froze their relations – economic and political – with Israel.

Morocco and Tunisia snubbed Netanyahu, while Qatar postponed a decision to open a trade office in Tel Aviv. Furthermore, Qatar's foreign minister cancelled a scheduled meeting with his Israeli counterpart, David Levy. (Oman, however, has not followed Qatar's lead.)

Meanwhile, much to Israel's dismay, the prospect of joint projects with Jordan faded. When Israel signed a peace treaty with Jordan, there was heady talk of building common resorts along the Dead Sea, constructing an airport between Eilat and Aqaba and developing regional water resources.

These ambitious projects, despite the best of intentions on both sides, have not panned out. The heavy hand of bureaucracy is doubtless a reason. But more importantly, many Jordanians, inculcated with an anti-Israel bias, are still reluctant to do business with Israel.

This raises another question – the fear that Israel will subjugate the Arab world if given free rein. Israel's gross national product far exceeds that of all its Arab neighbors, and Arabs are afraid that Israel will take over their economy. This view has been expressed by Arab intellectuals and politicians alike, and Israel is keenly aware of these feelings.

Last year, in a speech to Israeli industrialists, Yossi Beilin, Israel's former deputy foreign minister, warned that "they [the Arabs] perceive us as an economic power that seeks to dominate them, and this calls for serious thought on our part."

But for now, Israel's immediate problem is to persuade nervous foreign investors that Israel is a safe, stable market. It may be a hard sell, given the unprecedented violence which recently rocked the territories and the uncertain status of the peace process.

Clearly, Israel's ability to build a strong, vibrant economy is partially dependent on its ability to reach a political accommodation with its Arab neighbors.

PM's peace strategy after Hebron still unclear

By DAVID LANDAU
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM – Almost half a year into his administration and with the Hebron redeployment apparently now imminent, debate is swirling anew around Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu.

Is he a pragmatist or an ideologue?

Many leaders, diplomats and political observers here and abroad are undecided about where the 46-year-old premier will head next, given his actions on Hebron and recent statements on the course of the Israeli-Palestinian peace process.

Opinion

Nonetheless, they all would agree on the importance of better understanding Netanyahu, whose meteoric rise to power has left his own country as well as the rest of the world wondering about his long-term strategy.

That Netanyahu, the Likud party leader, has kept everyone guessing at this point in his term is no small achievement, some would add. Others, less sympathetic to Netanyahu, argue that perhaps he does not know where he is headed. They point to examples of fumbled decision-making as evidence of the young leader's irresoluteness.

The pragmatist-ideologue debate first occurred immediately after Netanyahu's May 29 election victory, but it subsequently died down.

The controversy has resurfaced, however, with the current talks on the implementation of the Israeli redeployment from most of Hebron.

The planned pullback from the West Bank town is a dramatic event, which makes it natural to re-examine the ideological makeup of the leader who has to implement the redeployment while trying not to isolate the hard-line members of his coalition.

At the same time, Netanyahu may soon face a Clinton administration that is still deeply committed to the Israeli-Palestinian peace process that it has promoted during the past three years. And for the most part, the administration in its second term will be freed of domestic political constraints in its dealings with Middle East peacemaking.

Predicting the course of U.S.-Israel relations during the next four years also has resulted in Middle East analysts making another attempt to pin down the political composition of the Israeli leader.

In and of itself, the Hebron redeployment does not necessarily provide firm evidence of whether Netanyahu is a pragmatist or an ideologue. For instance, regardless of whether Netanyahu remains a dyed-in-the-wool ideologue, he still could not have turned his back on the explicit Israeli commitment to turn over most of Hebron to the Palestinian Authority.

Netanyahu has indicated clearly and repeatedly that he does not intend to pull out of the entire West Bank, leaving Israel effectively denuded of the territories when the permanent-status talks reach their climax.

The final-status talks, which are scheduled to end by May 1999, will determine the status of Jerusalem, Israeli settlements and the Palestinian self-rule areas.

Netanyahu says his interpretation of "security locations" is broad and flexible.

And he has proposed several times in recent weeks that the two sides forgo the "further redeployment" phase altogether and move directly to the permanent-status talks.

Netanyahu has cited the U.S. commonwealth of Puerto Rico and the tiny nation of Andorra, tucked between France and Spain, as two examples of limited sovereignty that might serve as useful examples for fashioning a Palestinian entity.

Those who believe that Netanyahu is a pragmatist characterize these ideas as moderate.

But the ideologue school, which is more cynical, claims that Netanyahu's proposal to go to the final-status talks now is bound – even designed – to throw the entire peace process into a deadlock.

Regardless of whether he began as a rigid pragmatist, Netanyahu has already softened his own hard-line positions during his months in office.

Cairo economic summit supports peace progress

By NAOMI SEGAL
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM – The recent Middle East-North African regional economic summit ended with a declaration by delegates stressing the urgency of progress in the peace process, but stopping short of blaming Israel for the current stalemate.

The statement called for the removal of restrictions hindering development of the Palestinian economy, but it did not specifically cite Israel for imposing the closure on the territories.

While the declaration did not call for peace negotiations based on the land-for-peace principle, it did affirm a commitment to the 1991 Madrid peace conference, and to UN Resolutions 242 and 338, which Arab states say explicitly call on Israel to adhere to the land-for-peace formula. Israeli officials see it differently.

Some 3,000 delegates from more than 80 countries attended the conference. The Israeli delegation included 100 business and political leaders.

In contrast to the previous two annual conferences, the atmosphere at the Cairo meeting was marred by heightened Arab-Israeli tensions surrounding the stalled peace process.

Still, Finance Minister Dan Meridor said that essential contacts were made between companies and he considered the Cairo meeting an economic success.

Egyptian Foreign Minister Amre Moussa called for further regional development, but his remarks at a closing news conference focused on investing in projects that involved cooperation among Arab states.

Accomplished Toronto cartoonist to write book honoring Israel

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to the CJN

TORONTO — Ben Wicks, the accomplished Toronto-based cartoonist, writer and media personality, plans to write a book and host an hour-long television documentary celebrating the 50th anniversary of the state of Israel in 1998.

The book's working title is To Touch The Face of Home: The Birth of Israel. It was commissioned by Bloomsbury, a British publishing house based in London. American rights have already been purchased by Hyperion, the publishing arm of Disney. Although just beginning his research, Wicks says that publication is tentatively set for the fall of 1997.

"The book is about the birth of a nation – it's a magnificent story," he said recently in his office above the Red Lion pub downtown. "I want to get to people who were there in 1948 and hear their experiences. I'll write the history of the period and intersperse it with individual tales told by people who were in the street at the time."

No Time To Wave Goodbye, a previous book by Wicks that Bloomsbury published in 1987, told the story of three million British children who were evacuated to North America two days before Britain got drawn into World War II. While researching that book, Wicks sought out first-person accounts from participants, and received some 7,000 letters from people who had lived through the evacuation as children.

The author of 17 books, Wicks is convinced that it was this personalized approach, this focus on average people who are swept up in important historical events, that gave No Time To Wave Goodbye its immediacy, propelling it onto best-seller lists both in England and North America. He plans to use the same approach for the book on Israel, and has begun seeking participants in Israel's struggle for nationhood in Toronto, New York, Los Angeles, London – and, of course, Israel.

"This is history told in a series of personalized images," he said.

Ben Wicks

"Naturally, I'm interested in what Ben Gurion was doing in his office, but I'm much more interested in what Maizie Goldenstein was doing in the street outside his office."

Wicks, whose ancestors include a Jewish great-grandfather from Poland, is planning to visit Israel in early December and again around March; he seems excited at the prospect of seeing Israel again after an absence of many years.

He and his Canadian researcher, Montie Mazin of Toronto, are seeking letters (no phone calls or faxes, please) from "the extraordinary people who made their way to the Jewish homeland before or during the Declaration of Independence in 1948."

If you have a personalized story you would like to tell, write Wicks at 449-A Jarvis St., Toronto M4Y 2G8, and either he or Mazin may arrange a follow-up interview. As suggested by Wicks, questions for letter-writers to consider include: What was it like leaving loved ones behind? How did you travel to Israel? What hardships did you encounter on the way? What was it like when you finally arrived?

"There's a peculiar power in someone who's experienced something and set it down in writing," the British-born Wicks observed. "They claim they're not writers, but no professional writer could do better. It's the power of personal experience."

Some advance publicity issued by either Wicks or Bloomsbury romanticizes the subject and makes it seem that the book has already been published. "Based upon reminiscences of several hundred pioneers, To Touch The Face Of Home vividly brings to life the hardships, disappointments and triumphs of the first Israelis," it reads. "Highly readable and deeply moving, this is a story of courage amid deprivation and of new life rising out of the wilderness."

In The Spotlight

At 78, retired merchant Sol Mandlsohn isn't your average poet. "I wrote for 50 years without publishing one poem," says the former longtime president of Toronto's Bay Bloor Radio (now run by his son Mark). He composed his first poem as a 14-year-old student at Jarvis Collegiate: "Hold high your head amid this mortal muck / The others need not know your feet are stuck."

A published poet

The triple alliterations didn't escape the attention of Mandlsohn's teacher, who encouraged him to continue. Poem No. 2 came soon after: "Before you laugh / At any giraffe / Be sure to check / Your own neck."

Mandlsohn joined the army in 1941, becoming a radio mechanic, and afterwards became a businessman and raised a family. In the 1960s, he took up his pen again to write short poems on business themes – to wit: "Giving discounts may seem a curse / No business at all is even worse." That particular couplet came to him at the Westinghouse plant.

For almost six years, he was the resident poet at Home Goods Retailing magazine, which, during that period, appeared 26 times annually, never without a poem by Sol Mandlsohn. His name was featured in the masthead. Once, when he had forgotten his deadline, his editor waited patiently on the phone while he scribed a suitable stanza – and then expressed amazement, Mandlsohn recalls, at how quickly he had summoned his muse. The creation of the new poem had taken all of 10 minutes.

"Do you want to hear something incredible?" Mandlsohn asks ebulliently. "This is impossible but true. I found out recently that Home Goods Retailing is still publishing after all these years! I find that remarkable!"

Mandlsohn is no stranger to the arts. Over the years, he dabbled as an actor, making no less than 65 theatrical appearances. But poetry remains his first love. About a decade ago, he published three volumes of poetry. They were sold over the counter at Bay Bloor Radio. While the venture did not make him rich, neither did it impoverish him: the proceeds eventually managed to cover his costs.

Recently, he sorted through his collected works, which amount to an astounding sum of about 3,200 poems. He intends to publish them in eight or nine volumes, to be sold as before, over the counter at the store. Our best wishes go to this entertaining and epigrammatic poet of the people.

Fairy Tale Road

Our guide is sporting a multi-colored cape, tunic and leotards, a coxcomb hat adorned with ostrich feathers, and elongated orange leather shoes featuring baroque curlicues extending beyond the toes. Anywhere else, he would be locked up as a madman, but here in the picturesque village of Hameln (pronounced Ham-el-in) Germany, he is instantly recognized as the Pied Piper of medieval lore.

As he walks through laneways and streets, he plays occasional snippets of medieval ditties on a clarinet. Our group of seven follows as if in a trance.

We pass a schoolyard and the Pied Piper pipes a nursery tune that brings most of the children to the fence, their eyes wide in happy amazement.

"Out of every 10 children I meet, about two children run," he admits in perfect American English. "It's because some parents tell their children, 'If you're not good today, the Pied Piper will get you.'"

As we stroll through this beautifully restored town on the Weser River, the Piper points out distinctive buildings in the Weser Renaissance style, with their projecting bay windows and handsomely decorated gables. Dating from the 16th century, many of these half-timbered houses feature grotesque faces meant to scare demons away. But it is the Piper legend, not the exuberant architecture, that draws multitudes of tourists from around the world.

The Japanese especially are fascinated with this evocative tale of the stranger who came to Hameln in 1284 and lured the local rats into the river with his flute. After the burghers refused to pay him as promised, the Piper piped again, this time luring 130 children into a cave in a nearby mountain, in which they disappeared forever.

"The story is as popular in Japan as it is in Germany, because it fits into the Japanese ethic of being an honest person and being trustworthy, as in the stories of the Samurai," the Piper says.

A sad surreal medieval melody draws us along to the Ratcatcher's House, decorated with an inscription documenting the legend. Further on, at Neue Marketstrasse 3, the Piper points out the Jewish House, where 14 local Jewish families were rounded up before being deported to Theresienstadt in 1943: victims of an infinitely more malevolent piper. The site is marked by a plaque.

Although Hameln is a major stop on northern Germany's Fairy Tale Road, the story of the Pied Piper is not a fairy tale but a legend steeped partly in historical fact. Details of the tragic exodus from town were preserved in a medieval church window, which specified the number of people (130) and a date around June 25, 1284. "The part about the rats was later added to the story and has nothing whatsoever to do with the loss of the children."

According to one theory, Hameln's young people were

Perestroika exposes plight of minorities

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO – The pain and joys of life in the 80s are splashed on a brilliant canvas in Angels in America, Part Two, Perestroika. And incredibly, almost, it ends with a message of hope rising out of the gutter.

The plight of minorities, blacks, Jews, homosexuals and others in North America are pitilessly exposed, as are the ills of the larger society – drug addiction, power politics and loss of hope – in this Canadian Stage production.

Perestroika runs in repertory with Part One, Millenium Approaches, at the Berkeley Street Theatre until March. See both if you can – they are masterpieces.

"I am trapped in a world of whites, perhaps that's my problem," says the black nurse Nelize (Cassel Miles), the play's amazing linchpin. In a different vein, Louis Ironson (Louis Poch-Goldin) the neurotic Jewish gay who has deserted his AIDS-afflicted lover, recounts his many problems, and adds: "Like my grandmother said, 'Go know...'"

The political sophistication that threads its way through Angels in America is no more evident than in its devastating portrait of Roy Cohn (Tom Wood) political fixer and closet homosexual who in real life hounded Julius and Ethel Rosenberg to the electric chair.

As the valium-popping wife of one of Louis' lovers, Harper Pitt (Karen Hines) exemplifies the desperation of a woman who has lost her husband to corporate power and physical desire. Hines is exquisite in delineating a baffled woman turning to fantasy.

Her mother-in-law, the Mormon Hannah Pitt (Patricia Hamilton) strides through the play in seven-league boots, bringing it down to earth. To the dying Prior Walter (Steve Cumyn) who says he seeks the "kindness of strangers," she snorts: "What a stupid thing to do."

Playwright Tony Kushner is a Jew and the theme of black-Jewish relationships runs through both parts of Angels in America, always clothed in humor and reality. Belize urges a reluctant Louis to say a memorial prayer as an act of forgiveness when Cohn finally dies. "You know the Kaddish - hit it," says Belize, sincerely but irreverently. It turns out that the ghost of Ethel Rosenberg has to help Louis with the words.

In one of the final scenes, taking place in Jerusalem in 1990, Belize and Louis, the essential protagonists, are debating whether Israel should give up the West Bank to the Palestinians.

Angel in America covers so many bases it may not be fair to pick out one theme at the expense of others. The play probes deep into the world malaise – what life is, that's what you get!

Shaarei Shomayim brings Judaica to the people

TORONTO – If the Judaica can't come to the people, then the people will go to the Judaica.

That seems to be the principle behind Shaarei Shomayim Congregation's innovative new program of field trips to local collections of Jewish art and artifacts.

Put together by the shul's historical exhibitions committee, the program will feature seven outings to local museums, archives and collections of Judaica, guided by their curators.

The series of visits will provide a rare opportunity to see and learn about collections of local interest and historical importance, says committee co-chair Phyllis Fien.

The trips will highlight Jewish ceremonial objects and crafts, she said.

The program kicks off Dec. 4 with a trip to the Ontario Jewish archives, housed in the Lipa Green Building. Director Stephen Speisman will speak about the extensive collection of documents and artifacts.

Other venues are: the Morry & Kay Rotman Collection at Beth Sholom Synagogue (Jan. 28); a visit with Judaica collector and sofer Rabbi Avraham Kubayov (March 3); the European Judaica collection at the Royal Ontario Museum (March 16); the Reuben and Helene Dennis Museum at Beth Tzedec Congregation (April 8); the Kanner Heritage Museum at the Baycrest Centre (May, 1997); and the Holocaust Education and Memorial Centre (June, 1997).

Registration is limited. For details, call 416-789-3213.

lured away to build new villages in the east. But the Piper declares this theory weak. "Certainly someone would have come back or written a letter. The world wasn't so large back then. There's an element of tragedy in the story that this theory doesn't address."

A local scholar Gernot Husam has asserted that the town's young people "were the victims of a bit of ethnic cleansing," the Piper reports. Supposedly, a group of young people still clung to the old pre-Christian German religion, otherwise known as the Teutonic or Atlantean religion; they left town to commemorate the summer solstice with a religious festival – "a witches' dance" – in a nearby mountain.

"Many early Christians were dedicated to stamping out the old religion. Since these festivals were sometimes held underground in a labyrinth or cave, they might have forced a cave-in."

The highest mountain visible from Hameln, the Oberburg, is 15 km away; its slopes contain many relics of the old religion, and the sun rises from behind it in June. A sinkhole in the mountain, the Devil's Hole, also contains early Christians icons, but it remains unexcavated.

These details, more fully expounded in Husam's 1990 book Copper Brugge, have all but convinced the town's modern Pied Piper that "a bit of ethnic cleansing" occurred here 712 years ago.

Our group made numerous other stops along the Fairy Tale Road – Hamburg, Bremen, Gottingen, Marburg, Alsfeld, Kassel – seeing many sites pertaining to such Grimm brothers' fairy tales as the Bremen Town Musicians, the Goose Girl, and Sleeping Beauty. But Hameln's sad tale, so ancient and yet so redolent of modern times, seemed to affect us more than any other.

I flew from Toronto to Hamburg via Canada 3000 and traveled as the guest of the German National Tourist Office. More about Germany in a future column.

Israeli soccer team trounced by Cyprus

JERUSALEM – A very poor showing by the national soccer team in Limassol last week, in which the Israelis lost 2-0 to Cyprus, has brought the high-flying team down to earth with a thud and has put its World Cup qualification hopes in serious jeopardy.

Two first-half goals by Serbian-born Sinica Gogic were enough to sink Israel, which looked a shadow of its former self. There is no question that the result rightly reflected the difference between the two sides and not even the 2,000 or so supporters who flew out specially to support Israel could do anything to change the miserable night the visitors were having.

Perhaps the only consolation Israel can draw from the match is that neither Bulgaria nor group leading Russia will find it easy to play the Cypriots on their home soil, so another upset is possible and the Israelis, if they can return to winning ways, can be aided by such an upset.

Cyprus took control from the kickoff and played an excellent defensive game, placing tight marking on Eyal Berkowitz, Ronnie Rosenthal and Haim Revivo. Their excellent reading of the game also allowed the whole side to close down any open spaces and not allow Berkowitz or captain, Tal Banin, to develop any organized moves. Every time the Israelis tried to pass the ball, a Cypriot player would be there to cut out any buildup.

For their part, the Cypriots also managed to put together some constructive moves of their own and were obviously used to the poor state of the pitch, which made accurate passing very difficult. Gogic looked dangerous from the outset and had already tested Rafi Cohen in the fourth minute as Israel's defence looked shaky.

With only 10 minutes gone, Cyprus struck for the first time when Gogic backed away from Felix Halfon on the right and headed down a perfect cross from Marios Christodoulou who, broke into the area from the left.

Cohen in the Israeli goal had no chance of stopping the ball as Gogic rose high from seven metres out and guided the ball perfectly between the keeper and the near post.

Defence failed to close down empty spaces

Just five minutes later, Cohen dived at Gogic from behind and brought him down. Romanian referee Gheorghe Constantin had no hesitation in pointing to the spot, and Cohen's nightmare from the game against Bulgaria – when he committed an almost identical foul – was repeated.

The bad dream was completed for a second time, for as against Bulgaria, the Israeli goalkeeper failed to stop Gogic's well-taken penalty shot, which was struck hard to the middle of the goal.

The Israeli defence was again at fault, as it failed to close down the empty spaces, and Halfon, in particular, was having a bad night.

Cyprus would have made it 3-0 in the 26th minute, had not Alon Hazan intervened to clear a ball from the feet of Demetris Ioannu who was about to pop the ball in from close range.

The shaky defence caused Israel coach Shlomo Scharf to make two very early substitutions, taking off Halfon and David Amsalem in the 35th minute and bringing on defender Arik Bennado and prolific striker Ronnen Harazi to try to find a way past the Cypriot defence.

The change did shore up the defence, as Rosenthal, Nimni and Banin each took turns to fill the right back position, which was vacated by Halfon. Harazi up front, on the other hand, was unable to make inroads past the Cypriot defence, which was well marshalled by captain Pambos Pittas.

Only Nimni managed to recreate some of his penetrating runs, but even when a move was put together, some excellent work by goalkeeper Nicos Panayiotou kept the Israelis at bay. For the home team, the second half was all about sitting on its lead.

The Cypriots played a more defensive game and even though Israel was allowed much more leeway in the centre of the park, which led to some dangerous moves, the finishing touch simply wasn't there. Panayiotou thwarted several shots at goal, but the moves which Israel put together, particularly from the feet of Berkowitz, simply didn't have the conviction needed when a team is fighting back from 2-0 down.

Scharf tried to bolster the attack even more by bringing on Driks for Rosenthal with 15 minutes to go, but by that time Israel had thrown caution to the wind and piled on the pressure and the Cypriots conceded several corners and free kicks but to no avail.

Earlier in the day, Israel's under-21 side drew 1-1 with its Cypriot counterpart, Idan Tal scoring for Israel.

Israel's next match is against Luxembourg at Ramat Gan on December 15.

Hospital explores complex behavioral patterns

By LEILA SPEISMAN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO – Research being done at the Ezrath Nashim-Sarah Herzog Memorial Hospital in Jerusalem may throw light on the complex behavioral patterns in some neurological and psychiatric diseases, says the hospital's director general Dr. Yehezkel Caine.

The 100-year old institution is in a unique position to do this, Caine told The CJN in an interview during a recent North American visit.

"It was the first psychiatric hospital in Israel, probably in the Middle East, with nearly 100 psychiatric beds. As well, we have a special expertise in geriatrics, with over 200 beds devoted to that."

The merger of these two disciplines leads to an interest in complex diseases and aging, he said, adding that "there are a lot of similarities between the different types of processes going on in the brain."

Caine believes that "changes in behavior are always organic in origin, even if we haven't identified them [those causes] yet. Behavioral changes are caused by changes to the brain."

There is a commonality in problems that affect behavior that runs the gamut from relatively minor ones like Attention Deficit Disorder to schizophrenia, and even to what seem to be physical disorders like Alzheimer's disease and Parkinson's disease, he said.

"We know that many behavioral and functional changes are caused by a group of substances in the brain, called neurotransmitters. One well-known example is L-Dopa in Parkinson's disease, he said.

At the Herzog hospital, Caine said, researchers are carrying on the only trial in the world ("We think," he added carefully) on using glycine, an amino acid, to treat schizophrenia. "This is very experimental," he said of the study, which is being funded by the Israeli Ministry of Health and the Scottish Rite organization.

That is not to say, he added, that these problems are exactly the same, but that they have common elements, such as forgetfulness and rigidity.

Other research has led to the so-called "thrill" gene by the hospital's Dr. Richard Ebstein, a gene which seems to predispose people with it with a craving for excitement.

"When we learn more about ourselves," Caine said, "we may not use that knowledge immediately. But when we understand human nature better, we can better understand when it goes wrong."

Caine said much of the hospital's funding comes from Canadian sources, such as the Silver-Cooper Geriatric Rehabilitation Centre, donated by Nathan and Lily Silver and Florence and Sydney Cooper and UJA of Canada, and the Latner Mental Health Clinic, donated by Al Latner.

But he feels that despite this, many North Americans do not realize the difficulties Israeli society faces. "Over 20 percent of those who immigrate to Israel, will never work, but will remain on social welfare for the rest of their lives," he said. Many, especially from the former Soviet Union and what was behind the Iron Curtain are too old to retrain or for employers to hire.

He said Western immigrants who come to retire, even if they bring their own pensions and health insurance coverage, still use the resources of the state.

"Our hospital, like many others, is at the end of its tether – we have an occupancy rate of 140 and 150 percent, without any extra manpower and with smaller budgets.

"We must pose this question," he suggested: "Is it truly just Israel who is responsible?"

Mystic rabbi to speak

By LEILA SPEISMAN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO – Mystic and author Rabbi Avraham Greenbaum of Jerusalem will give a concert and a series of lectures on meditation, spirituality and spiritual healing in Toronto next week.

Originally from England, Rabbi Greenbaum was a BBC radio producer and broadcaster until he opened his own audio studio in Jerusalem in 1980. Since 1984, he has concentrated on translating the writings of Rabbi Nachman of Bratslov, and on his own books, which include Wings of the Sun, and Garden of the Souls. His most recent work is A Call to Live: Jewish Guidance in Healing.

He is the founder of the Azamra Institute, whose mission is, according to a press release, "to inspire commitment to authentic Jewish and human values and to provide guidance in our quest for meaning, health, healing and happiness both for ourselves and for the world as a whole."

Some of the ways to happiness, Rabbi Greenbaum says, include the return to Torah by the Jewish people, the observance of the seven Noahide laws by the non-Jewish world, promotion of faith, meditation, prayer and mystical wisdom, and women's spirituality.

The Azamra Internet Learning Project is spreading Rabbi Greenbaum's message through the Internet. It offers courses in a variety of areas of Jewish spirituality and at a variety of levels.

Another project is caring for the sick, through books, healing music on tape and an Internet site.

The week's events will begin with a concert by Rabbi Greenbaum called The Healing Power of Mystical Music, to be held Nov. 23, 8 p.m. at B'nai Brith House.

Rabbi Greenbaum believes that "Holy music has the power to lift the human spirit to the greatest heights of attachment to G-d and simchah."

Lectures will be held around the city from Sunday evening through Wednesday evening. There is a charge of $15 for the concert and $10 for each lecture.

For more information, call Dr. Allan Bortnick at 782-2113.

The Inside Back

About Life

Dear Ella,

I was raised to believe that money isn't everything and good friends are more important than anything monetary. This is why I am struggling with this problem.

I have a very close group of about 12 friends. We often see and speak to each other individually. We even exchange e-mail letters. We have made a pact that three times a year we all set aside our busy lifestyles and go out for dinner as a group. We take turns picking restaurants and we always have a great time until the bill arrives. Whatever the total is, we just split it evenly.

Here is where I fight my conscience. I don't eat very much, I usually only order an entree. Most everyone else orders appetizers, entrees and desserts. I can live with splitting the food. It's when I see the bar bill that I lose it. I don't drink liquor and resent having to pay for everyone else's drinks. The liquor part of the tab is usually as much as the food part. I usually end up paying anywhere from $50 to $75 for an evening, when my share should only be around $20. I even started to think about not joining them for dinners anymore. Am I being petty? What do you think I should do?

Wine Not Mine

Dear Wine Not Mine,

Your friends probably don't even think about your share of the bill, especially at the end of the evening.

Ask the waitress at the beginning of the evening to supply a separate food and bar bill. Split the food bill with the other 12 and let them take care of the bar tab. I'll bet none of your friends will even bat an eye. As a matter of fact, it may even hit home that you have been paying for liquor that you never consumed all along.

You are a rich person to have such a special group of close friends. Don't let your conscience prevent you from enjoying these wonderful evenings together.

Immensely important dates

Diplomatically Speaking

BY JEHUDI KINAR

In 1997 we will celebrate many momentous events. One hundred years ago the first Zionist Congress was convened in Basel, Switzerland. The Zionist idea, which had been developing for many years, was at this time formalized as a political movement. The goals expressed in 1897 culminated in the establishement of Israel, an independent Jewish state.

Eighty years ago, the British foreign minister, Arthur James Balfour, sent a letter to Lord Rothschild that could be seen as one of the elements in the foundation of the future state of Israel. In his letter, Balfour wrote, "His Majesty's government views with favor the establishement in Palestine of a national home for the Jewish people, and will use their best endeavors to facilitate the achievement of this object."

Although it took more than 30 years until the independence of Israel was declared and we did not see too many British "endevors to facilitate the achievement of this object," nevertheless Nov. 2, 1917 should be seen as a milestone in our historty.

Fifty years ago the UN General Assembly voted on Nov. 29, 1947 in favor of the partition of Palestine into two independent countries, one Jewish and one Arab. This was quite a change from Balfour's proposal, who years earlier had suggested that the Zionist movement should found a state of and for the Jews in Uganda.

Thirty years ago, in June 1967, we were faced with an all-out war with all of our Arab neighbors who were allied against us. Only Lebanon did not participate in this onslaught against Israel. The results of this war are known to all of us. It is because of the Six Day War of 1967 that we were able to celebrate this past year the 3,000th anniversary of a united Jerusalem.

All of these dates are of immense importance to us and we look forward to the many celebrations. We would love to bring Israeli culture closer to those outside of Israel, and this would provide a wonderful opportunity. We will simultaneously begin the exciting preparations for the following year, when Israel will rejoice on the occasion of her 50th anniversary.

The establishment of the State of Israel is the single most important event in the modern history of the Jewish people. The right to self-determination and the ability to identify ourselves formally and legally as a nation with a land of our own is an irreversible fact. This has enabled us to develop further our national identity and our sense of peoplehood, and is a binding force for Jews the world over. Furthermore, in just half a century we have succeeded in establishing ourselves internationally in the arts, sciences, technology and business. Indeed, we are quickly becoming an important and well-recognized trading partner for many countries.

Last year 1,100 people joined a Jerusalem 3000 solidarity mission to Israel. There will be another such mission in celebration of Israel's 50th anniversary. Wouldn't it be wonderful if this time we could fill 50 buses.

I can imagine many kinds of festivities, but the best chag is one in which everyone participates. The maxim, "We are one," is not merely a slogan.

PARTY PLANNER

Rich in Judaica

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

There are stores in the Greater Toronto Area that bring a huge assortment of Judaica items from Israel to this city. One of the best known is Israel's the Judaica Centre (416-256-1010) located at 897 Eglinton Ave. W., and 444 Clarke Ave. in Thornhill.

Israel's takes prides in providing for the Jewish needs in the community – in homes, schools, synagogues and at simchahs. It provides Jewish theme party products like napkins, plates and balloons to high-end, finely crafted Judaica giftware, says Joyce Eklove, manager of the Eglinton store.

"We carry a wide range of items so we can serve both the secular and the very Orthodox communities," she says.

Israel's carries ritual items from menorahs to kiddish cups, as well as a large assortment of coffee table Judaica books for gifts, says Eklove. Some couples have a bridal registry at Israel's purchasing such items as the Encyclopedia Judaica, havdalah sets, mezuzot and menorahs, she says.

At Israel's, bar and bat mitzvah celebrants are choosing to purchase such things as the Jerusalem Bible, siddurim, kiddush cups and travelling candlesticks.

Israel's also carries ketubot and wall hangings for anniversaries and weddings, Eklove says. "There's no limit to what we can provide. We have a full range of gift items and we pride ourselves on having a complete price range."

Israel's carries one-of-a-kind items handcrafted by local and Israeli artists and artisans, she says.

Another store offering high quality Judaica items is the Silver Centre (416-398-2929) at 3889 Bathurst St., which is now celebrating its first anniversary.

Silversmithing is a trade that can be traced to biblical times, says store owner, Yossi Silverstein. "The tradition dates back to the work of Bezalel who crafted the first portable tabernacle."

The Silver Centre imports most of its items from Israel, which produces some of the most exquisite silver Judaica items available, Silverstein says. He notes that his store is the exclusive Canadian representative of Hazorfim, the oldest and largest silversmithing company in Israel. He also carries European work.

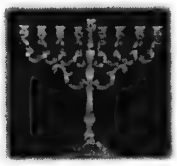
The centre's shelves are laden with an array of silver religious items from tzedakah, etrog and spices boxes to matzah and challah trays and Torah pointers. There's a selection of Yemenite filigree work on candlesticks, menorahs and mezuzot.

Shoppers can find picture frames and silver Judaica miniatures of dreidels, Shabbat candlesticks and menorahs.

The centre also carries the work of Israeli artists Sam Phillipe, Ben Zion, Arad and Saad as well as those artists represented by such companies as Netafim and Caspi. The artists create silver sculptures, both modern forms and figurative biblical scenes.

Silverstein says that his prices are very competitive with some kiddush cups and menorahs selling for as little as $42 and $100 respectively. Spice boxes start at $100.

Gift items can be ordered on the phone and shipped and delivered anywhere in Canada and the United States by the Silver Centre. The centre also offers an engraving service to personalize the gifts.



Menorahs from the Silver Centre.

Hand-painted ketubot cherish and preserve the moment

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Special to The CJN

One of the most meaningful parts of the Jewish wedding ceremony is the reading of the ketubah. That moment can be preserved and cherished with a hand-painted, original ketubah by artist Karny Rivlin Vorona (226-3131).

Vorona, who specializes in original custom-made ketubot for weddings, haftorahs for bar or bat mitzvahs and anniversary ketubot, incorporates biblical quotes with various artistic mediums and themes to develop a one-of-a-kind piece of art that will never be duplicated.

The artwork, presented on natural bark, parchment or paper that is aged using Vorona's secret formula, is a delicate blend of illumination done in water color, gouache, chinese stick ink or gold leaf, among other medium, entwined with text.

A Star of David is constructed from the words of Song of Songs and a blessing to the young couple. The text, done in different colors, runs from red to purple to blue and back to red.

A couple's picture may be surrounded by intricately drawn magnolias or orchids with the text handwritten to match the floral design. A three-dimensional effect is

Consultants lighten demands

By ERIC LAYMAN
Special to the CJN

Planning a party seems to grow ever more complicated and demanding. Consultants Florence Wilder (416-222-2977) and Tamara Temes (416-222-7712) both see it as their professional mission to lighten these demands. After all, however much organization a party requires, "simchah" means "celebration", not "ordeal."

Temes, who specializes as a bridal consultant, identifies four C's which are essential in her profession: capability, compatibility, commitment and caring. In essence, Temes and Wilder do not disagree, though they differ in which qualities they emphasize.

There are many consultants out there; so how do you choose the one who's right for you? Talk to several before you decide, advises Temes. The best consultants offer you a free preliminary meeting, a chance to get to know one another and see how well you can work as a team.

There's no way to find out but to meet your prospective consultant in person, states Wilder. This is the only way to learn if you are compatible. It's possible for someone to have the finest qualities, yet lack rapport with you and this rapport is indispensable. Look for someone who treats you as a unique individual, Temes insists. Consulting is a service, and cannot be turned out on an assembly line.

Along with personal compatibility, both Temes and Wilder consider capability a must. This includes both reliability and organizational talent and organization should include rehearsal of the event. Knowledge of who does what in the professions associated with parties and party planning is also necessary, especially if you want the consultant to choose your florist, videographer or other professionals; so make sure your consultant knows a selection of people in these fields.

Besides dealing with other party professionals, a consultant may have to talk to your family – or, if you are getting married, both your families. In the case of an interfaith marriage, a consultant is often, in effect, mediating between two cultures. In consequence, Wilder finds that her work involves being "a bit of a diplomat."

Wilder believes that if necessary, a consultant should even offer you a shoulder to cry on. Your emotional involvement with your simchah is a natural thing; and even today, in planning a wedding, the immense responsibility devolves mainly on the bride.

Anyone who takes consulting seriously will appreciate this, and show what Temes calls the quality of caring.

As Wilder puts it, a consultant should be "always on call, but never seen."

Look for someone who knows how to stay on the sidelines, until you need her – and gives you the professional input you need, but without being a tyrant. Temes adds, elaborating on the idea of commitment, that your consultant should not want to dictate when she comes and how long she stays, but fits her schedule to your needs.

If you're getting married, the wedding will be one of the memorable days of your life. Pick your consultant with care, and you will be able to enjoy your simchah – not just nostalgically, in memory, but as it happens.

Other consultants are:

Heidi Gruenspan (905-738-5030); Judy Stein Consultant (905-764-7604); Lynn Borlack (905-882-4989); Lynne Meredith Elkind (416-487-5334); Marla Kay (905-882-2042); Raquel Sananes-Grad (416-398-0217); Sarah Cherry (905-764-7121); Shaindy Cohen Goldstein, Consulting (416-781-1064); Up & Coming Events (905-886-8148); Yael Azuelos (416-789-5408)

Bring on the bands

Are you thinking of hiring a singer for your simchah? If so, bandleader-singer Rena Gaile (905-420-8625) and Shelley Miller of Miller Entertainment (416-484-1044) have some useful suggestions.

Before choosing a singer, Miller advises, decide on the practical details. Do you want a single performer, a duo or a group? How long do you want them to perform: one or two numbers? a whole set? Do you want someone who can work with musicians, without them or both?

Gaile places great value on dress and demeanor. Is the singer tidy and well-groomed? How does she carry herself? Does her attire show class and sophistication? Once a singer satisfies you on this score, ask to hear her voice. Before your guests hear her, they will see her in the spotlight; their first impression will be visual.

Usually, thinks Gaile, a singer should dress formally. Of course, there are exceptions, depending on the occasion; both Miller and created by using three pieces of paper and bringing the outside decorations into the text.

Grandparents or parents may want to present a bar or bat mitzvah child with a handpainted version of their Torah portion with the most important parts emphasized in larger letters or stronger colors. Incorporated in the work could be the names of family members or blessings entwined with flowers, birds, butterflies or abstract decorations. Sephardi style is often made up of an architectural or biblical design.

"A child studies very hard for this occasion and a gift such as this is a constant reminder. It is with them forever," says Vorona.

Children can honor their parents special 25th, 50th or 60th anniversary with an anniversary ketubah, says Vorona. "A hand-painted family tree can be a very special gift for a married couple with children."

Vorona, president of the Israeli Artists Group of Toronto, a past president of the Calligraphic Arts Guild of Toronto and a member of the Jewish Artist group of Ottawa, spends "countless hours" on each piece of work and suggests people give her a few months to develop "the perfect piece. I pay attention to each minute detail and I often encourage my clients to see a sketch and design before I start the original piece. When they are pleased with the rough sketch, I begin my work.

"I do not do the framing myself, but I do help with it and I make sure that the frame is an integral part of the text or the haftorah. The design on the artwork goes right into the frame because everything is an important part of the design. We are creating one unique piece," she says.

Although a ketubah makes a "magnificent wedding gift, it cannot be a surprise because a couple must know they have a ketubah," says Vorona. "In any case, involving the couple in the process is a wonderful experience. I love being part of this very happy time in their life — the beginning of their Jewish life together."

Rick Levine and Lynn Cohen are having two more parties and everyone is invited.

The organizers of the fifth annual We're Having a Party, a trade show showcasing a variety of party planning professionals are expanding this year's show to include a downtown location at the Sheraton Centre as well as at the Premiere Banquet Hall and Convention Centre in Markham.

"Some people cannot get up north and others cannot get downtown. By having two locations, we're catering to everyone," says

Levine's inviting you

Levine. "The Sheraton location will open at 12 noon so that workers can come on their lunch hour, after work or whenever it's most convenient."

The shows, to be held at the Premiere Banquet Hall on Monday, Jan. 27, from 5 p.m. to 11 p.m. and at the Sheraton on Tuesday, Jan. 28 from 12 noon to 5 p.m. and 6 p.m. to 11 p.m., promise to be the party of all parties. Guests can mingle with dozens of party planning experts such as consultants, decorators, florists, musicians, photographers and travel agents, as well as enjoy some taste tests and watch demonstrations and live performances from bands and disc jockeys.

"Guests will feel like they are at a party," says Levine.

The show was first conceived, Levine says, when a group of party planning professionals got together to plan a way to promote their talents.

"Our goal was twofold. We wanted the community to become aware of what services are available and we wanted the professionals to have a chance to display their talents. We've had a tremendous reponse every year."

Cohen, a party consultant for more than 20 years, and Levine, an orchestra leader who offers a full entertainment package including disc jockeys, MC's and dancers know how difficult it can be to begin planning a party.

"Many people do not have a clue where to begin, but from the moment they enter our show they can see that everything is laid out in full color. There are people to talk to, information to obtain and shows to enjoy. It really takes the mystery and frustration out of the whole process.

Takes away the stress

"As well, our show saves people a lot of time. Imagine trying to see all these professionals one at a time. It would be impossible. This way guests can talk to a few people, take home some literature and study it at their leisure. It takes the stress out of a potentially stressful situation and fills a definite need in the community," says Cohen.

To make things even easier, she says, "we've published a handbook, available free of charge to all guests, that offers tremendous advice, from choosing a band to buying a diamond to finding a travel agent. Also included is information about such things as the chupah, interior design and makeup.

It really is an invaluable tool. It gets people in touch with every aspect of giving a party," says Cohen.

People well on their way with their party plans or even those with no immediate plans will enjoy the show, says Levine.

"Guests will be surprised at all the novel ideas out there. Kodak, for example will be showcasing their latest disposable camera. The camera, bundled in a bridal package, is left on every table and guests are instructed to take candid shots and leave the exposed camera. The hosts then develop the pictures and have a whole new outlook on their simchah."

The show, which is free of charge, benefits everyone, says Levine. "It brings the hotel industry together with suppliers and it brings the public together with exhibitors. It allows for mingling and getting to know each other. We are offering guests something they cannot get anywhere else – a trade show with a party atmoshere.

The one-stop way to shop

By ERIC LAYMAN
Special to the CJN

The point of a one-stop party supplier is to offer the widest possible selection, the idea being much like that of the department store or supermarket. Michael Shneer of Party City (905-709-9399) and Mel Grevler of Party Supply (905-764-5457) may be competitors, but on this point, they agree. How, though, do you choose among competitors?

Compare prices, of course, Shneer urges, and look for price guarantees, as they give added assurance that you're getting the best. Grevler stresses the goodwill value of "old-fashioned honesty," low prices and encouraging the customer not to spend more than is necessary.

Look for the best quality available as well as variety, Shneer advises. A store should carry not just every color of cutlery, for example, but every weight from heavy to light. Also, it should be up to date, with current patterns, colors and licensed products.

Grevler, whose motto is "the party should start when you enter the store," believes the layout tells you something about the quality of product and service to expect. The store should be fun, chock-full of items that catch your eye – and easy to find your way around in.

Does the store display items out of the package, Shneer asks, so that you can see what they really look like? And, with "interactive" being the buzzword these days, are you allowed, even encouraged to interact with products? Is there a "please clap" sign, for instance, telling you how to get that noisemaker going?

Shneer and Grevler both maintain that the greater the variety and quantity of goods, the more important a high level of service is, and that a one-stop party supplier provides a service as much as an item. Otherwise, you can get lost in the range of choice and pro fusion becomes con fusion.

Accordingly, Shneer advises, look for amenities like a free party planner checklist, customized wedding invitations or helium

Duette dresses you in style

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Special to The CJN

You want to look perfect on your wedding day, but you also want things to be as stress-free as possible. Can you have it both ways?

Yes, says Anna Di Renzo, designer and owner of Duette, a bridal boutique located near Oakwood and Eglinton Avenue (416-654-8030).

"If a bride goes to a boutique that can outfit her from head to toe, including accessories, then the stress of shopping in several stores is immediately eliminated. She can relax and have the experts provide her with the care she needs."

Di Renzo, who trained at Ryerson Polytechnical University and University of Toronto, provides brides and members of the bridal party with either custom designed or customized gowns.

"We design from scratch or we can alter certain parts of the gown such as the neck, sleeves, bodice or even fabric. I make sure, however, that my clients know what they are getting into when they order a custom-made gown – there are a lot of changes along the way. When they buy a customized gown, they see what they are getting from the start. Sometimes people are more comfortable with that. I usually advise clients to have a garment custom-made only if they cannot find all the elements they want in a gown."

The '60s look is a hot trend in bridal gowns this year and Duette features Jackie Onassis-type sleeveless gowns complete with a gold-trimmed scooped neck that can be worn with a jacket for the synagogue. Off-the-shoulder gowns can be made with snap-off sleeves for the ceremony.

"There is a lot of art deco fashion out there and fashion often spills off onto bridal gowns. An empire waist gown with a guippure lace bodice is also popular," says Di Renzo.

Colors, she says, are still predominantly white or ivory and fabrics run from silk to 50 percent silk and 50 percent matte to satin and tulle or satin and chiffon.

Di Renzo advises brides to browse through the latest bridal magazines such as Wedding Bells or Today's Bride before starting to shop, in order to get some idea of what they might like. Tear out the pictures that are most appealing and go through these pictures to eliminate second choices.

"It makes the shopping process a lot easier if brides have even a tiny idea of what they want," she says.

Above all she says, it is imperative for brides to shop at a boutique in which they feel comfortable. "Feel free to ask questions and make sure your consultant is knowledgeable and confident in answering questions. My customers come back a minimum of three times and in that time I get to know them well. By the time they pick up their gown, we are friends," says Di Renzo.

Accessories complete any outfit, she says, and in order to save the bride from going from store to store, Duette carries everything from headpieces and earrings to shoes and jewellery. "We pay attention to every last detail so the bride looks perfect."

CLICK! CLICK: Freezing the moment

By ERIC LAYMAN
Special to the CJN

In a city this size, you can't check out all the photographers — not even the ones you like. How do you decide who suits you?

Greg Dean of Signature Photography (416-399-1967) and Mark Stern of Mark Stern Photography (416-383-1333) offer several tips to help you make your choice.

If you can't go with someone whose work you know, choose from among two to four. See them in person, Dean says, see their work, find out their prices and pay attention to everything you see, not just the albums and what's on the walls. Is the business card well designed? Are you at ease in the office? Little things tell a better story.

Above all, make sure you and the photographer are compatible. This often requires flexibility in style. Quality work is important, but both Dean and Stern rank compatibility even higher. If an assistant may be doing your party, it's best to meet him. Whoever does the work has to have a style that you like – both professionally and personally.

Before choosing, talk to your most important guests. Though it's hard to generalize, says Dean, grandparents often prefer a formal, traditional style, children a contemporary style with more candid shots and special effects, and parents something in between.

The preference also varies with the kind of simchah. At a wedding, grandparents may have a lot of say, whereas at a bar or bat mitzvah, it's the parents and kids. Don't assume these patterns will apply in each and every case, though, Stern warns.

As to your preferences, ask yourself what you like best: posed shots (like the traditional formal portrait or group photo); the genuine candid shot (say, a kid caught unawares blowing up a balloon, his cheeks puffed out and red); or what Stern calls the "candid pose" (as when the bride cutting the wedding cake holds still just as the knife goes in, so that the photographer can get the shot).

Look for solid formal training plus practical experience, advises Dean. Membership in a professional organization tells you the photographer keeps up to date, sees others' work and gets feedback on his own. While it is an artform, however, photography is also part of the entertainment; and the skills of capturing the special moments at your simchah can be learnt only in practice, dealing with people.

Dean and Stern both stress that the photographer should have the flexibility to work around your schedule and be at your event when you need him, for however long you need him. Without being overbearing, he should be a bit more visible than the videographer and stay near the main guests in order to get close-ups and portraits.

If he enjoys his work, says Dean, it's a very good sign. Likewise, adds Stern, if he can deal with the unpredictable, if instinct and experience have taught him to be in the right place at the right time (especially for candid shots), if he stays alert and if he doesn't mind sometimes not taking breaks.

Finally, Stern recommends booking one to two years ahead to have control over dates. The pictures of your celebration will be part of your life for decades; don't put off until the last moment the choice of who's going to take them.

If you enjoy them at the time they're taken, Dean asserts confidently, you'll enjoy them later.

Sharon Firestone and Bill Batista of Caterers York are seen at Beth Tzedec Synagogue.

Caterers York continues in the Firestone tradition

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO – Forty years ago, Mickey Firestone established a catering business at Beth Tzedec Congregation that is still a leader here.

Today, his daughter Sharon Firestone and Euclides (Bill) Batista, who formed a partnership five years ago when Mickey retired, continue in the Firestone tradition of elegant catering.

Caterers York has become the caterer at the Pride of Israel Synagogue as well as at Beth Tzedec and they have expanded to form Sweet York Desserts, an on-site bakery which provides gourmet pastries and special occasion cakes for both synagogues as well as for hotels and other synagogues.

"We are always challenged and must constantly read the current trends and incorporate them," says Sharon Firestone. "We work with our chefs and create custom dishes for many of our discriminating customers."

Recently, Caterers York added two new chefs. Alfred Hu's talents include vegetables, fruit, ice carvings and food decoration. Ron Dukelow's specialties include international cuisine, buffets, and French banquets.

"People are sharpening their pencils more today than ever before – they are shopping around," Batista says.

Although contemporary foods and service are still popular, he says, many people try to include something that will give the event a special flare.

"Station parties with different foods at each station are gaining in popularity. The choices are extensive because these events can be both casual and elegant, and we find that they work extremely well."

The trends today, notes Firestone, include requests for more fish along with a choice of meat, and for vegetarian dishes and menu items to meet special dietary requirements.

Batista, who has been at the Beth Tzedec for 30 years, told The CJN that the Pride of Israel Synagogue accepts bar/bat mitzvah parties for non-members which, along with Saturday luncheons, have increased the demand for Monday and Thursday morning simchahs.

With an increasing number of kosher facilities in the city, Firestone says, for some time people looked for the most interesting place to hold a simchah, but more and more people are returning to synagogue functions.

"With so many choices for kosher events," says Batista, "we must stay one step ahead."

Firestone, who worked with her father for many years, says, "Although my father retired five years ago, he still drops in from time to time to add some friendly advice."

Keeping the skin young

BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to the CJN

A customized bridal package offered by Zahava.

As people age, their skin–care regimes should include regular facials, according to esthetician Bonnie Palmer, owner of the Ete Salon (927–9634), at 26 Bellair St. in Yorkville.

Ete Salon offers a variety of services, among them facials, acne treatment, leg waxing and electrolysis. The European-trained Palmer , who has been in the beauty business for approximately 20 years specializes in electrolysis – she's had a lot of success with a 16–needle machine from California — and skin care —she's known for giving thorough facials.

She says one of the newest skin–care products, glycolic acid. which is also known as alpha–hydroxy acid, is a natural substance made from sugar cane and fruit acids that can be applied to the skin in different strengths. Small amounts are used in skin creams, but it can also be applied in more concentrated strengths in facials, by professional estheticians.

The glycolic acid exfoliates and helps to renew the cells to improve the skin, Palmer explains. Her two–hour facials consist of cleaning the pores and massage, which improves the circulation. She also steam cleans the face and extracts black heads.

Collagen, once a key ingredient in skin–care products – it puffs up lines in the skin – has been surpassed by other products, she notes. "Collagen used to be very popular, but there are many other new products like alpha–hydroxy acid." Palmer does not recommend it, especially for women in their '20s and early '30s who have no need to use such a product. However, exfoliating the skin with alpha–hydroxy acid is good for any age group, she adds.

She also advises people to clean the face well after make–up removal, to go without make-up on some days to give the skin a rest and to change their skin–care products temporarily, for about three months, every one to two years, to give the skin a break from the product.. Heavy foundation should be avoided because it clogs the pores, but it is sometimes necessary to use it to protect the skin on very cold windy days, she says.

Brides wanting to give themselves a special beauty treatment for the big day, could benefit from a cleansing facial because the make-up is easier to apply after a facial, Palmer says. But she stresses that the facial should be done one week to 10 days ahead of the wedding or big event so any redness or blemishes that occur from the facial can be cleared up.

Customized bridal packages which generally include a facial, pedicure, manicure, and leg waxing are available at the Zahava Beauty Centre, (630–6300) a salon and school located at 842 Wilson Ave in North York. now celebrating its 25th year.

Owner Zahava, who trained in Switzerland and France, started the beauty school, an accredited school of aesthetics, some 20 years ago. The centre offers a host of beauty treatments which includes facials, electrolysis, manicures, pedicures, cellulite treatment and make–up.

The cellulite treatment is done with a special ionization machine which massages the area of the body that has cellulite, Dan Saarony, manager of Zahava's explains. "It helps alleviate problems with cellulite. People lose inches."

The centre also carries Dinur Cosmetics, specialized skin care products from Israel which utilize minerals from the Dead Sea. "The Dead Sea is known to be healing and rich in minerals, Saarony says. "The same properties benefit the skin."

Zahava clients have the choice of two price ranges for a variety of beauty treatments. If they use the school there is a significant saving for such things as facials, and leg waxing. For example a full leg wax – the price includes the bikini wax– costs $40 in the salon and $27 at the school. Similarly the facial, consisting of deep cleaning and massage, is $40 and $27 respectively.

Saarony stresses that an instructor overlooks the procedure and students have to be fully qualified before they see clients. Although the students learn electrolysis it is not available through the school.

Saarony advises that brides ordering a wedding package come in to plan the package services two months before the wedding. Zahava's also offers self improvement courses and corporate packages.

Other estheticians are: Beauti Contol/Sandra Meleca (905-828-7552); Francine Birken (905-881-5527)

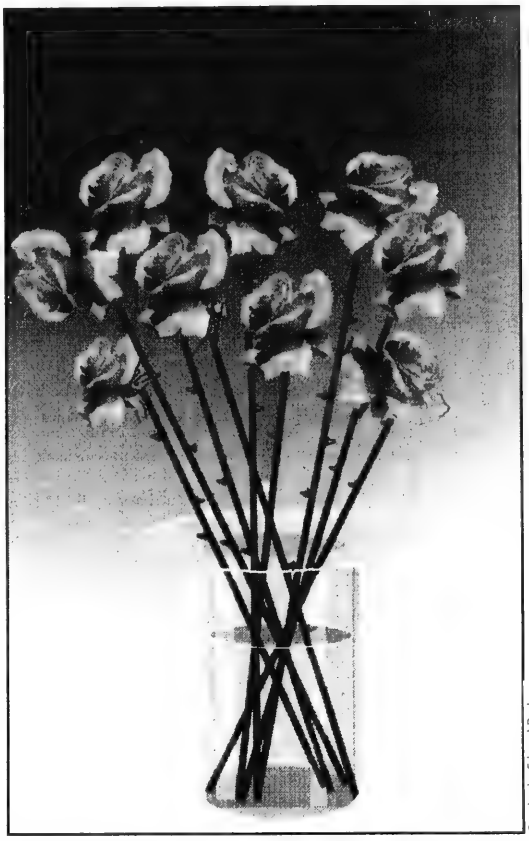
Flower power:

A lot more than simply red

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Special to The CJN



Graphic by Edward Dunbar

Flowers can make a room say whatever you like says Karen Baker of Designs by Karen Baker (905-886-8100).

"Add some flowers to a bare room and you give it life," says Baker who operates the room decor and flower shop in Richmond Hill. "If you want a tropical atmosphere, add some haleconia, antherium or a variety of orchids in bright purples, oranges and pinks and you've said it all.

"We've filled a room with palm trees for a Middle Eastern theme and we've taken hydranda, lysianthus and oceana roses to create a country garden decor," says Baker who orders from such places as Ecuador, Costa Rica, California, West Indies, Holland and Australia.

"The more exotic flowers are orchids from Bangkok and insidiums from Thailand."

Keeping to what clients can afford, however, is important, she says, and stresses that even those on the strictest budget can have a well put together room.

"Depending on the time of year, we can use seasonal or local flowers such as sunflowers and present them in colorful vases.

"It really is all in the display. A large stately vase can make any flower look elegant. Even ribbons that match the color scheme brightens up the room. A florist needs to have visuals. She needs to know what will make a room look great and work towards it. They can take courses and learn all the mechanics, but they still have to know how to visualize how a room will look. The thoughts they have in mind must come out of their fingertips."

She advises clients to come in and see how their flowers will look with the proper table linen and vases.

"I also invite them to go out and see some of the functions we've done in order to get some idea of what they can put together. There really is no end to what we can do with flowers."

Another florist is: GreenLeaves & Petals (905-709-4080).

Joy's known for her evening-wear

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to the CJN

If you're looking for the right dress for a simchah or special event it's best to go to stores that specialize in evening wear.

Joy Cherry's in the Yonge-Lawrence area is known for its selection of fine evening-wear from formal gowns to cocktail dresses. Sales associate Lorna Weinstein describes the look this year as "simple elegance." Dresses with "clean lines" like the slip dresses, available in a variety of fabrics – silk, silk charmeuse, silk satin, satin and jersey are in vogue, she says.

Black reigns as usual as the number–one selling color, but hunter green is an important shade for evening wear, she notes.

Cocktail suits available in four–ply silk, brockade, satin, and velvet are also popular, Weinstein says, pointing out that one of the most elegant cocktail suits – it's made in England – is a satin jacket paired with a velvet skirt.

Ball gowns with crinolines for very special occasions are also available at Joy Cherry's but that style does not suit every figure, Weinstein notes. Long dresses with jackets or unconstructed gown are more flattering for fuller figues, she says. Specialty alterationists are on site so dresses can be adjusted for the best fit possible.

Velvet is shown every year and particularly popular at holiday time, with pattern or cut velvet a fashion trend for this year according to Weinstein. "Velvet is very seasonal. It's worn from the end of October to the end of February."

Joy Cherry's carries some satin and velvet gowns as well as velvet and tulle. "Different textures are put together for interest," Weinstein says.

Chiffon, satin, silk and crepe are the popular fabrics for evening wear. Beading is making a comeback, but heavily beaded gowns are not common because people are looking for more versatile outfits that they can wear on more than one occasion, she explains.

The store carries a range of evening-wear from Europe and the U.S. by such design lines as Bell ville Sasoon of London and Gregory Cicola and Chris Cole of New York. Prices begin at $500.

Joy Cherry's offers a full line of accessories from wraps to shoes, says Weinstein. "We give a complete look to our clients from the dresses and accessories down to their toes."

Other fashion outlets are: The Hat Box (416-787-5944); Joy Cherry (416-489-8809); Piccolo Mondo Childrens Wear (416-789-5807); Satin Party Shoes (504-8823).

Cookbooks for all occasions and interests

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
CJN Staff Reporter

Good cookbooks are not only pretty to look at; they are exceedingly useful. The following volumes will doubtless sharpen your skills in the kitchen.

The Sephardic Kitchen (HarperCollins, $42.50) is a wonderful book. Sephardi cuisine, a melding of delicious flavors from many corners of the world, has produced such stellar dishes as pescado sofrito a la Judia (fried fish), apio (braised celery root and carrots) and yaprakes de oja (stuffed vine leaves).

These and other recipes are found in The Sephardic Kitchen, written with loving care by Rabbi Robert Sternberg, a person whose knowledge rivals that of my mother-in-law, a fine Bulgarian lady who has taught me to appreciate the food of the Mediterranean and the Balkans.

Beni's Family Cookbook (Fitzhenry & Whiteside, $27.95), written and illustrated by Jane Breskin Zalben and with a foreward by maven Joan Nathan, celebrates the culinary treats of Jewish holidays like Passover or Chanukah.

The recipes are irresistible, running the gamut from sweet potato tsimmes and brisket to honey cake muffins and baklava. Mmmm!

Rose Elliot's Vegetarian Cookery (HarperCollins, $40), first published in 1988, is an excellent primer. Beautifully illustrated, it contains over 300 recipes, as well as pertinent information on a whole host of ingredients.

Charmaine's Solomon's Complete Vegetarian Cookbook (Harper Collins, $35) is a blockbuster of a book, containing 600 flavorful recipes from all over the world, including the Middle East and the Far East. Lavishly illustrated, it is a lasting testament to the author's knowledge and flair. Definitely recommended.

The World's Finest Pasta and Grains (General Publishing) by Anne Marshall is lavish in scope and color. The recipes, culled from Europe, Asia and the United States, are simple to understand and yield excellent results.

Trattoria: The Best of Casual Italian Cooking (Little, Brown,, $26.95) by Mary Beth Clark serves up home-style dishes any gourmet would savor. How about a tomato-bread soup, cannelloni or oven roasted potatoes with rosemary and garlic? You'll find these and other recipes in this attractive book.

The World's Finest Chicken (General Publishing) by Sonia Slyer and Janice Metcalfe will inspire readers with its mouth-watering recipes. They are augmented by 90 inviting photographs. A feast for the eyes.

PARTY PLANNER

Waiters serve piece of mind

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Special to The CJN

If you think that hiring waiters for your private party is beyond your means, you have not spoken to the people at Gemini Waitering Services (573-1365).

Owner Sean Haber, 24, who took over the 8-year-old business about a year ago, says that at $15 an hour per waiter, "even at a minimum of four hours, hiring us is a luxury, but it is definitely an affordable luxury."

One call to Gemini, says Haber, and the party gets rolling. "We discuss what type of party it is, how many people are coming and then we determine how many waiters are needed. For a house party I usually suggest one waiter for every 15 to 20 people. It is important to have enough staff to get the job done so if 25 people are coming, I like to see two waiters plus a bartender, if necessary."

Peace of mind is the number one reason people hire waiters, he says. "We come in early and prepare the platters; heat up the hors d'ouevre and warm up the food. The only thing we do not do is cook. We also mop up the kitchen and clean the dishes so it looks like there was no party at all. The hosts can easily sit back and enjoy themselves.

Outgoing and friendly

"Before the party we send out a questionnaire which asks when the food should be served, how to warm it up, what type of platters to prepare and any special instructions. If the waiters have a list and a set area in which to work they do not have to ask the clients about every detail."

He says that the waiters, who come dressed in black pants or skirt, a white dress shirt and a red bow tie are all outgoing and friendly and are "quite intuitive so they see what needs to be done without having to ask. They also know how to be inobtrusive so although they are there doing all the work, they are not in anyone's way. They just add some elegance to the party.

"I prefer my staff to have training and some come from George Brown College's Foodservice and Bartending course so they have been properly trained. We also have professionally certified bartenders who are able to suggest what alcohol and wine to stock and what wine goes with what type of food."

Wanting to provide a one-stop party service, Haber will also arrange for the dinnerware, flatware, tent, florist, disc jockey, sno-cone or popcorn machine — "anything needed to make the party a success. We'll also come in and assist with the decorating. When we say we make the party, we really help help make it."

Meet your travel agent in person to ensure reliability

By ERIC LAYMAN
Special to the CJN

Graphic by Edward Dunbar

Some people continually shop around for new travel agents, while others prefer a lasting relationship. Judy Jacobs of Goliger's Travel (416-979-1313) and Shelley Fremont of Fisher Fremont Travel (416-481-3323) agree that the long-term relationship is best.

When people choose an agent, Fremont observes, they pick someone they know, not the agency as such. Meet your agent in person; then, after you establish rapport, you can do business on the phone. Know your own travel needs inside-out, Jacobs advises, so you can communicate them to your agent.

For example, do you travel regularly on business, or only on vacation? Do you keep to an itinerary, or change your mind? What interests you more, destination, route or mode of travel? The mode affects the importance of details – they matter less on a plane, say, than on a ship, where you spend more time and will be more concerned with such details as travelling companions and cabin sizes. Families or newlyweds planning a cruise should first see the ship on video.

Do you plan everything yourself and have the agent rubber-stamp your decisions? Or do you want a partner, who knows you well enough to anticipate you? He hears what you say, but also what you leave out; he knows enough to ask you, not just where you want to go, but where you've been and where you enjoyed yourself most.

Your agent should be enthusiastic about your trip and show the same interest that he would if he were travelling. You probably don't want to make decisions which involve the hassles of planning. The agent should do the planning, then offer you choices and let you pick whichever pleases you most.

In the travel business, offers and prices change fast, without notice and an agent's job is to keep you informed in spite of this. A good agent can tell you about specials that won't even be on long enough to be advertised. Good automation is important, Fremont concedes, but it's only backup for your agent's memory.

Think about your budget; identify your upper and lower limits. Your agent should respect the fact that you are spending hard-earned money, but you, in turn, have to remember that a few hundred dollars extra often means a better vacation. Pick "an agent who spoils you", Fremont suggests; but expect to pay for extra service.

In the next few months, Fremont predicts, agencies will be charging for services like research or faxes. They cannot afford to offer such services free, as they cost time and money. By the same token, if you pay more, you should expect more – and do more follow-up on your agent's research.

In vacation travel, Fremont observes, an agent makes dreams come true. Jacobs agrees, referring to vacation money as "happy money."

Call when you return from your trip, Jacobs suggests, to let your agent know how you enjoyed it. Thanks is much rarer than criticism, but if there are problems, your agent needs to know – and should even call you, says Fremont, to ask how your trip went.

With seat sales generally seven to 14 days in advance, it's hard to say how far ahead to book, but if you don't book early for holiday season travel, you won't get a seat at all. Even so, you can plan farther ahead; you can book a hotel now, for example, and your flight later.

In sum, the details of planning a good trip will be well looked after if there is solid rapport between agent and client. On this, Jacobs and Fremont are of one mind.

Pros offer you pointers on how to choose a band

By ERIC LAYMAN
Special to the CJN

If you've never hired a band, or weren't satisfied with your choice when you did, the prospect can be intimidating. Choosing is easier if you follow these pointers from three Toronto-area band leaders.

Not every band will suit your simchah – one which is ideal for weddings might not be what you want for bar mitzvahs. Russ Myers (905-771-0257) suggests you hire a band you enjoy working with, who is enthusiastic about its work in general and fits your image of the unique event you're planning now.

Look for full-time musicians: they have to play well. Besides word-of-mouth referrals, ask for references, including letters. Check with a venue where the band has played, suggests Sheldon Kagan (905-882-5888), and look for a band which does follow-up, to see how its clients enjoyed themselves.

"For a bar or bat mitzvah," suggests Stan Hiltz (416-667-9649), "trust your kids. Older people usually prefer live music; it's more personal and less electronic."

If you can do so without crashing parties, hear the band live in different settings.

Kagan adds that you should listen to the tapes they play during the breaks.

The band leader (whom Hiltz compares to the head chef in a kitchen) should be open-minded, able to work with other people and ready to accommodate your tastes and work to your schedule. He has input, but you have the final say. He should be organized, yet able to deal with the unexpected.

Kagan advises planning the entire program with him in advance – especially timing, which he compares with the tempo of a musical composition.

A good band works hard, coming early to set up, and staying till the wee hours if need be. Myers suggests having them play as much as possible and take breaks during the speeches.

According to Myers, a good PA system and sound technician are a must, and in an interactive band, the singer should wear a wireless mike to move among the crowd.

As for volume, Hiltz advises playing within a "bubble of sound". Don't blast the back corners with music; people who want to hear will come closer.

If the band is part of the party, everyone has more fun. Youthful energy appeals to everyone. In our impersonal world, there is a resurgence of live music, because people still respond to people. Especially for a wedding, there's nothing like people on stage making music to which guests can dance.

Myers thinks a band neec wide, constantly growing repertoire of traditional and contemporary material. Also, their sound should be authentic, reflecting the culture from which the music comes. Horahs, klezmer and chassidic songs, for example, are quite different, both musically and in their origins.

Kagan advises booking eight months to a year and a half ahead to get the band you want and benefit from today's prices.

Hiltz points out that while a band should be able to work within your budget, you pay for quality. Musicians spend a lot on training and equipment.

Kagan – who, for a successful affair, puts the band on a level with the food – states bluntly that for a good time on a moderate budget, a good DJ is better than a mediocre band. If you can, hire a good party band; but for a successful affair, don't skimp on entertainment. Get the best within your means.

Disk jockeys agree with Bob:

The times they are a changin'

By ERIC LAYMAN
Special to the CJN

Ed McMurtry of Mr DJ (905-737-8670) and Corey Mandell of Mandell Entertainment (905-886-4000) emphasize different aspects of what it means to be a disc jockey, but both agree that in the last several years, the field has changed a great deal.

Mandell remembers that when the economy required it, there was a trend to hire DJs instead of bands and as people got used to DJs, they demanded more. In response, disc jockeys now compete with bands, MC-ing live interactive shows with props, costumes, even live musicians. While their major appeal is to kids, adults are coming to like them too.

To choose a disc jockey, Mandell maintains, you need more than word of mouth. See their work. What's right for someone else might turn you off. Even a demo tape isn't enough; look at a video of an actual event. Best of all, see your prospective DJ at work, live. McMurtry suggests that you get references from professionals, like videographers or others who work the party circuit. He also mentions the Canadian Disc Jockey Association, whose members are reputable and set standards for the business.

McMurtry values presentation and appearance. For most simchahs, whether there's an interactive show or just background music, formal dress is OK; even kids like to see a tux on stage.

Look for someone who rehearses every event, he continues – and tell him everything about your simchah: formal or causal, audience age and tastes and whether they're conservative or more open to new ideas. An event must be well-planned, yet have an interactive spontaneity tailored to each unique audience.

It's all right, McMurtry thinks, to make a music list, but narrow it to general preference and a few key songs. A good DJ will ask what you want to hear, what you don't want to hear and what to do if a guest requests songs you don't want to hear.

Entertainment matters as much as music. "A DJ," he insists, "is not a human jukebox."

As a mobile entertainer, he has to deal with new crowds and come up with new ideas constantly, while perfecting older ones; and says he's "only as good as his last show".

Bar mitzvahs are most demanding because the entertainer has to strike a balance in pleasing both children and adults.

Weddings are more elegant and understated, and give a chance to build the audience-entertainer relation gradually. Instead of tossing plastic leis out into the audience, for instance, as at a less formal affair, the DJ-MC leaves some where your guests will notice them, watches to see whether they pick them up, and takes his cue from there.

For quality entertainment, Mandell advises, look for digital equipment. Get a company with backup staff and equipment and some technical expertise; the higher the technology, the greater the expertise. For a DJ, the technology is more important than it is for a live band.

Don't go by price alone, Mandell warns. It's only one factor. You can compare prices on goods, like novelty inflatable guitars, but not on entertainment, which always involves personality. Entertainment costs about one-twentieth what food does; but next morning, people remember it. Why not spend a little more? For a wedding, Mandell estimates a disc jockey wedding package should cost about $500; for a bar mitzvah, from $525 to $5,000.

Book at least six months ahead, Mandell advises. As much as two years ahead, says McMurtry – and start your search some weeks before you book. That way, you make sure of getting the right DJ at the right time.

Innovative party ideas

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

Imagine a birthday party for 15 9-year-old boys with energy to burn.

They get into a pillow fight that escalates into a food fight.

The next thing you know they're throwing water balloons at each other and the place is soaking wet.

Sound like a parent's worst nightmare? It's a child's dream party come true if it takes place at the Mad Hatter's Tea Party (905-475-2854) at 7676 Woodbine Ave., #12 in Unionville. Not only does someone else clean up the mess, parents don't even stay for the party.

Mad Hatter's provides all the supervision. You drop the kids off and you have two hours before you have to pick them up.

Mad Hatter's offers the ultimate parent-friendly birthday party at parent-friendly prices. The minimum package for a group of up to 10 children (the place is geared for children ages four to 12) includes 10 complimentary invitations, hotdogs, birthday cake, candy lootbags, juice, ice cream, face painting and the food-fight food. The cost for each additional child is $12.

The party begins with the opening of the presents and the staff keeps a list of the presents. The children proceed through a maze and have a pillow fight.

Then it's on to the games room, followed by the wet room – children need to bring towels and bathing suits – for a water fight. For $35 extra per 10 children, you can order whipped cream or Jello that the kids throw at each other before the water fight.

After they're dry, they have a supper of hotdogs and juice and then it's time for the food fight with marshmallows and popcorn. There's face painting and the birthday child blows out the candles and everyone gets cake and ice cream.

Other options that can be added to the package include candy-filled piñatas at $45 each, specialty birthday cakes for $30, and arts and craft lootbags for $3.99 a piece. Mad Hatter's will also take

Many gifts to choose from

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Special to The CJN

It's the age old question. What can you buy for someone who has everything? Several companies in the Toronto area may have the answer you need.

The Present Company (416-510-0084), owned by Linda Banks and Pamela Smith is a 3-year-old store that recently relocated to the Leslie and York Mills area.

"Our mandate is to save people a trip to the mall. Not only are we one of the only gift stores in the area, we carry stock that is difficult to find anywhere else," says Banks.

From china, cast iron and wooden gifts to pillows and throws, The Present Company caters to people looking for a unique, high-quality item," says Banks. "Brides have been thrilled with our Fiestaware, a brightly-colored dinnerware line with an art deco pattern that originated in the 1930s. It is lead-free and highly collectable. It is a great pattern to register."

Registering for weddings and showers is a large part of their business and Banks says that brides get extra-special attention when they come in.

"We walk them through the store, help them make a list and decide together what would be best for their home. We have items for every budget and if someone buys a gift with which the bride is not perfectly happy, we exchange with no fuss at all."

She says that although they have a relatively small store, they are continuously replenishing the stock and always looking for something new.

"With three patterns of china and items such as bakers racks, plate stands, picture frames and even baby shower items such as stuffed animals and baby throws, we really do cater to everyone."

Different opinions offer reliability

By ERIC LAYMAN

In some ways, Abe Salzman of Video Affairs (905-889-0909) and Darren Sager of D.M.S. Video (905-881-7677) have different approaches to what makes good videography. However, they agree on some important points and by considering both their views, you can form reliable standards for choosing a videographer.

Sager says there must be a match between the videographer's work and your taste. Insist on seeing his work ahead of time, he says, rather than try to be a maven on state-of-the-art equipment, let your eyes be the judge.

Salzman says that instead of a demo tape compiled from a videographer's best 10 events, you should ask to see a complete tape of one single event. This will tell you more about how good he really is – just as a singer's live performance tells you more than a studio recording. And pay attention to audio quality, he adds.

Among reputable videographers, Sager sees many differences in quality, style, taste and equipment, and as videography is an artform, like music and photography, talent matters most. Salzman puts more emphasis on technology. Make sure your videographer has the best, he advises – both in cameras and editing equipment.

Salzman recommends that the videographer let you take part in editing. You can leave it entirely up to him, of course, but generally, the end result is better if you take home a copy of unedited footage, view it, and return it to the videographer with editing notes. If it's a bar mitzvah video, Salzman suggests letting the bar mitzvah boy have input in editing. Some have later worked for him as assistants. "I may be creating my own competition," he laughs.

Look for someone who does hand-held camera work with no wires and everything portable, Salzman says. This allows the videographer to get close to the action, without intimidating the guests. He doesn't have a tripod, wheels or wires, but he can capture close-ups without being shaky.

Sager does offer one piece of technical advice. If your videographer "knows his stuff," he uses camera light, not external light, for intimate moments, but for exactness of image, external light is best.

A good videographer, Salzman and Sager agree, has good rapport with you – and works well with other professionals at your event, like caterers and photographers. A capable consultant takes some of the work off the videographer's shoulders, but he still has to be well organized.

Sager and Salzman also agree that a good videographer is unobtrusive, staying on the sidelines and blending with the crowd, but he's ready to capture that special

Bands entertain above all

Gaile agree that a 13th birthday party by the pool is different from a wedding.

A good singer, Miller believes, constantly expands her repertoire. Gaile wants a singer to offer a wide choice of material and style, to appeal to different kinds of audience – and to sing every song in a way that respects its ethos and origin.

Miller, whose wife is a singer, sees a growing demand for a uniquely Jewish form of entertainment, namely a capella singers with a Jewish repertoire, for Shabbat afternoons. This involves mainly traditional Hebrew songs, with a little popular material drawn mostly from the theatre.

Gaile, who hires singers to work with her band, insists that a singer's personality mesh well with band and audience alike. What counts is not temperament, but confidence, sincerity, style and charisma.

As audiences grow more sophisticated, Miller observes, they want better singers; but first and foremost, they want entertained. A singer has a r sibility to your guests an enjoy entertaining. One can gently create a mood for an audience, but basically, it's the guests who lead.

For Gaile, a good singer not only has the material down pat, but also has the ability to ad lib or engage in repartee with the band and guests. Miller speaks of the singer as "adding seasoning to the music." Gaile also stresses the importance of timing – a song which goes over well once a set is underway, for example, is not always a good opener.

What ultimately counts is what you see and hear. But referrals, especially from other people in the entertainment field, can help narrow your choice. Also, look for a singer who will help plan the music program for your party. And book six months to a year in advance as the best singers are in high demand.

Music is central to your party; and many people find that of all music, the human voice is most compelling. A well-chosen voice can make your simchah a special event, both at the time and in memory.

ture store that carries a unique line of wedding, shower or birthday gifts. Sales representative, Julie Burbury, says that one of their most popular lines is Alessi, a line of kitchen and home gifts that includes such items as candle sticks, tea kettles, napkin holders, trays and even pots and pans.

"Most items are produced in stainless steel, but they also have some available in silver plate. Furthermore, Alessi carries a collection of funky functional kitchen accessories produced in a high quality plastic.

"A great gift can be chosen from our line of cast aluminum free-form bowls and candlesticks designed by Matthew Hilton. Each piece is unique and and signed by the artist."

Gord Cohen, owner of First Place Promotions (416-410-8811) has the perfect gift for the sports fan in the family – a solid wood baseball bat, hockey stick or oar, with the recipient's name carved in the centre.

"The bat or stick is ready to be wall-mounted and is guaranteed to leave a lasting impression," he says.

The sports item is a great gift for guests who do not want to give the bar mitzvah boy money, says Cohen, "Imgine the look on a 13-year-old's face when he receives a bat complete with his name and a plaque with the date of event. It is a fantastic keepsake. It's a great gift for an adult as well. It brings out the kid in every guy."

Cohen, who went into the business just over a year ago says that all the items are manufactured in a Toronto plant and take about two or three weeks for delivery.

Different venues cater to clients' different needs

By ERIC LAYMAN
Special to the CJN

Today, with so many more kosher venues for your simchah than there were a few years ago, choosing which one suits you can be difficult. Neither David Lazar at Shaarei Tefillah Synagogue (416-633-0344) nor Kim Goldenstein at Regal Constellation Hotel (416-798-6433) claims to serve everyone's needs.

Before you look for a venue, suggests Lazar, think about your party. What kind of occasion is it? Is it formal or causal, buffet or dinner, large-scale or intimate? With your answers to these questions in mind, you are better equipped to decide whether a particular locale is the right one.

Have an idea of your budget in advance, advises Lazar. If budget is the major factor, says Goldenstein, a hotel is not what you need; a good restaurant or banquet hall is usually less expensive. At a hotel, you pay for ambience and the convenience of finding everything under one roof. Only spend if you expect value, but given a basic standard of service, spending a little more will get you more.

At a hotel, out-of-town guests can "take the elevator home" and the trained staff offers a high level of service. A hotel can often host larger groups – and unlike some smaller venues, will always provide you with your own private room. The larger hotels also have experience with various budgets, group sizes and kinds of event, from school groups to corporate conferences.

Even so, Goldenstein understands that some people find the intimacy of a restaurant more congenial. For a hall, says Lazar, food and location are the major drawing cards. He includes service with the food, not as a separate factor, and says ambience is less important, because people bring in their own.

It's hard to say how far ahead to book a hotel, says Goldenstein. For a synagogue, Lazar recommends booking two years in advance for spring or fall events, and one year for winter or summer, depending on the date. He can give you today's exact prices and ballpark figures for two years ahead. The menu should be finalized four to six weeks before the event.

Goldenstein advises talking to people who have used a venue. Even if you're sure what you want, shop around and make tentative bookings; this gives you the right of first refusal. Look for someone who will send you where you need to go if their locale isn't right for you.

For a smooth-running party, Lazar recommends the caterer's own hall, because the caterer has everything on hand and is accustomed to working there. At a synagogue, you get more personal attention, and in some things, management may be more flexible than at a hotel, where there are often a dozen functions at once. Moreover, a hotel environment is secular, whereas in a synagogue, the entire setting is religious.

Most business for a hall, says Lazar, is referrals or repeats. Goldenstein also acknowledges negative referrals: if someone has a good experience, they tell one or two people; but if it's bad, they tell dozens, because their expectations are disappointed. This means that anyone in the catering professions has an interest in getting it right for you the first time.

Other kosher places to throw a party are: Baycrest Hospitality Services (785-2500, ext.2477); Beth Radom/Freda Tobler (416-636-3451); Royalton Banquet & Convention Centre (416-222-1230); The Sheraton Centre (416-361-1000).

Broken glass from under the chuppah can become a Suspended Treasure

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Special to The CJN

Keep the memories of your wedding or the wedding of loved ones forever with a gift created by Suspended Treasures (416-445-0202).

Owned by Yael Elfassy and Devra Wasser, the company specializes in using glass obtained from under the wedding chupah and turning it into a piece of artwork.

Elfassy, who was recently married, says that she received her wedding glass in a case as a present and thought it was a beautiful idea.

"When it came time to give another couple a present, I wanted one they would never forget. We came up with the idea of suspending the glass in a permanent acrylic case.

"What we do is instruct people to gather the glass in a napkin, which really can be done without anyone noticing. They then come to us and we decide on a shape, which can be a Star of David, a Torah, a simple cube or one of their own choosing. We have it made into a mould and include a nameplate with the couple's marriage date.

"Ready-made moulds cost about $150 while a custom-made mould runs a little more."

She says the finished works, which are on display at several local synagogues including Temple Sinai, Beth Tzedec, Pride of Israel and Holy Blossom, take about six to eight weeks to make "but are well worth the wait. They are unbreakable, easy to clean and show beautifully under spotlights. They really are a conversation piece.

"Suspended Treasures also make a tremendous housewarming present. I once saved the glass and gave it to the couple when they bought their first house. The happy memories of their wedding accompanied them to their new home.

Can't have a party without invitations

By ERIC LAYMAN
Special to the CJN

Calligraphy for your invitations is important, but it is not the only factor. Both Gilda Lefton of Stationery Plus (905-881-5588) and Mark of A & D Invitations (905-731-5864) offer total service, involving everything to enhance your invitation.

Both Lefton and Mark consider experience an important factor. Find out how long an invitationer has been in business and whether they have expertise in work other than social printing. Look at their work and talk to friends who use their services. Of course, for establishing rapport, nothing beats face-to-face conversation.

The invitation is the first communication between you and your guests, Lefton points out. It will be with them six to eight weeks before your simchah and long after it as a tangible memento. Besides being informative (kind of simchah, in whose honor, place, date, time and kind of dress), its wording should reflect your feelings for the guests and the occasion.

Most customers, says Mark, like their invitations to be either very simple or very elaborate. Lefton believes something simple can make a strong statement; all the possible adornments are less important than reflecting the personality of the person(s) for whom the simchah is being held and the mood of the occasion.

Before you hire anyone, look for a variety of languages and typefaces – and possibly, for convenience, accessories like kippot or party favors. Though you will use only a fraction of what is available, a professional with a wider range of service is more likely to be able to serve you. And when the work is done, get proofs, as you would for an ad. (Proofread backwards, Mark suggests; it's easier to catch mistakes.)

As Mark puts it, you, the customer, are the real designer of the invitation; so your invitationer should be willing to accommodate you. A business builds its referrals by "going that extra mile" – like mounting bows on the cards or working with you outside conventional business hours. Of course, if what you want won't fit or could be improved, the invitationer has a responsibility to let you know what can be done and what cannot.

The more you want done, Mark advises, the farther in advance to book. If you're sending invitations to the United States, four months is not too early – or even six months, if the invitation requires more personalized work. Something plain, he concedes, can be done in as little as seven days.

If you're mailing, do so at the latest six weeks prior to the event; eight weeks for overseas. Lefton advises starting work on your invitations six months or even a year in advance.

Make sure you get enough invitations, Mark warns. Reordering is costly. If you're only ordering 75, then 100 won't cost much more; but if you need large quantities, estimate more precisely. There's not much volume discount for anything under 500. Gilda advises that to allow for last-minute additions and addressing or mailing errors, you add 25 to your basic order.

Your invitations are important. Sit down and make a list of all the points you want to cover to be sure that you get the best possible work and service. Then go to a professional – and use your own judgment.

Quality menswear can be affordable

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to the CJN

When King Constantine of Greece needed a tuxedo for his son's wedding last year he summoned Stavros Theodoro-Poulos of Toronto to outfit all the men in the wedding party.

Stavros, as he prefers to be called, is a master tailor who has been making hand-sewn suits for celebrities and executives for 45 years. The Yorkville shop that bears his name, Stavros Master Tailor & Shirtmaker (416-924-8144), is located at 95 Cumberland St.

Stavros says his clients come from as far away as England and San Francisco because they want the quality craftsmanship he offers. It takes 32 hours to make a Stavros suit, 90 percent of which is hand-sewn. The cloth comes from the finest mills in the world.

The fit distinguishes a finely hand-crafted suit from a factory made one, Stavros says. "A made-to-measure suit should fit like a glove."

To ensure the best fit possible, he has devised a special method of cutting patterns to create jackets that follow an individual's body shape. Jackets with tapered waists, he says, are more flattering than loose-fitting factory garments.

His suits hold their shape because the outer cloth and lining are stitched onto a canvas foundation at the shoulders and front torso, he says. "Without the canvas, the suit bags and sags."

Robert Kennedy who has worked along side Stavros for three years, notes that the detailing of a handmade suit cannot be replicated by machines. "We're proud of what we do and it shows up in the craftsmanship," he says.

He points out that each buttonhole of a Stavros suit is hand-sewn and the breast pockets are angled so that the pattern of the material can be matched vertically and horizontally. Cuffs are surgeon cuffs — the buttons open and close unlike those on the cuffs of off-the-rack jackets which are just decorative.

Stavros says his suits, priced from $2100, offer good value: they can last at least 15 years, provided the jackets are hand-pressed and the owner doesn't put on too much weight. The store carries high end accessories – ties, socks, sweaters, etc., including an exclusive line of black tie accessories.

Stavros makes suits fit for kings. But such fine craftsmanship is a dying art. His youngest tailor is 56, Stavros laments. "When the master tailors of my generation retire these fine suits will no longer be available."

Heritage Clothing (416-789-5192) at 103 Orfus Rd. is the place to shop for those people seeking fine quality, well-priced executive and upper-end suits. The 50,000 square-foot fashion house offers shoppers a huge selection in all sizes of top quality suits, says Heritage Clothing president David Rosenberg.

"We believe we have the best selection of men's upper-end apparel under one roof in the country. Instead of having 20 locations we have one huge location only offering one-stop shopping." The store carries a wide-range of accessories with ties priced from $10 to $55.

The merchandise is priced well below their competitors', filling a special market niche, says Rosenberg. "When we started the business there was no one selling high-end clothing at popular prices. That's where Heritage has positioned itself."

Heritage's private label-Canadian-made suit (retailing from $270) is "equal in quality to the $1200 suits," Rosenberg says. Italian designer suits retail at Heritage from $470. "In other stores they easily sell for $1500."

All Heritage suits, including tuxedos, are lined to the knee and are made from cloths that conform to Halachic specifications. Italian-made suits are more softly constructed, Rosenberg says.

He says tuxedos, made from German faille cloth, a very dressy wool, are trimmed with satin and have a special protective layer built-in to absorb and camouflage perspiration. The tuxedos which start at $595 are "easily a $1200 value. It's an incredible upper-end tux. For the price of three rentals you can have a tuxedo forever."

Heritage carries a large assortment of black-tie accessories which include suspenders, cummerbund sets and pleated shirts with regular and wing-tipped collars. There is also an alteration department— five tailors with more than 20 years of experience — can customise any garment right on the premises.

Rosenberg, who with his sister Anita Rosenberg Gleberzon recently bought Heritage from their father, says being a family-run business has been one of the key aspects of Heritage Clothing's success.

"The family aspect distinguishes us from the competition. My father had enough confidence to sell the business to us. I hope we can pass it on to the next generation."

Another men's fashion outlet is Beatties (416-481-4459).

The one-stop way to shop

tank rental to fill your balloons – and friendly staff to help you use these services. Ideally, he continues, the staff should interview you, to stay tuned to your tastes.

Grevler promotes the idea that management as well as staff should interact with the customers, offering suggestions, help and good humor.

At any time of year, says Shneer, a good party supply store will be full of seasonal and theme merchandise, be it Chanukah or summer holidays, sci-fi or rock 'n' roll. Selection is very important, because items geared to your party's season will often be hard to come by. While some stores feature one season at a time, Grevler's approach is different. You should be able to see merchandise from all seasons at once; that way, you can plan ahead, however far in advance of your simchah.

As you see, Shneer and Grevler agree on almost everything. Probably, they disagree on which of them is better at meeting the criteria they set for one-stop party suppliers. As to whether you end up agreeing with Grevler, Shneer or someone else, it's up to you to find out.

City has a wide choice of kosher caterers

By ERIC LAYMAN
Special to the CJN

Graphic by Edward Dunbar

It's been said that the success of a simchah hinges on two factors: food and entertainment. Choosing the right caterer is thus vital to the success of your simchah; so how do you choose, now that there is a wide range of choice among kosher caterers?

Ask around, advises Deena Schaffer of Malmar Fine Foods & Catering (416-638-0091). Talk to the caterers you're referred to – then talk to some more.

"Unless a client knows me personally," says Esther Klein of Adeer Catering (416-781-4433), "they shop around before they decide."

Pick someone who catered an event you attended, where you enjoyed the food and presentation. Getting a sample meal is a good idea too, but a caterer, Schaffer points out, has to please every guest. Are the other 200 meals going to be as delicious as the one you ate? Except for those who specialize in small gatherings, a good caterer can work on both large and small-scale events.

Both Klein and Schaffer list good food, service and rapport as the essentials. If client and caterer have rapport, then everything else works out, Schaffer says. Rapport creates trust, which in turn creates ease of mind. Then you can sit back and enjoy your food, "like a guest at your own party."

Of course, the caterer has to do what you want in quality and taste. Any caterers will do their best, but is their best what you want? What's ideal for someone else might not be for you. You need to feel free to ask your caterer any question at any time. Also, your preferences have to overlap a good deal – not just for how the food tastes, but also how it's served. Presentation contributes a great deal to the success of a party.

Here as everywhere, the adage remains true: the customer is always right. At the same time, Schaffer insists, a good caterer never compromises the quality of food or service. A solid reputation is based, not in cost-cutting for its own sake, but in value for the dollar you spend.

Moreover, says Klein, most clients do take the caterer's advice, though they are free not to.

A successful caterer needs a talent for organizing – not only in preparing and serving meals, but in coordinating with the other professionals at the party, like entertainers and photographers.

At the same time, Schaffer observes, how the caterer does the work is not your problem; as a client, you are concerned with results.

Schaffer tells of buying B.C. cherries from exclusive retail stores one week after the B.C. cherry season ended, in order to please a client. More often, it happens that a caterer is asked to prepare a special meal for someone with food allergies or other special needs. Not only will a good caterer do this, but that special meal will be as delicious as everyone else's.

Klein advises booking a year ahead, or as soon as you know the date of your simchah.

The wider the range of caterers to choose from, and the more you expect from your caterer, the less you can afford to delay your choice.

Other kosher caterers are: Adath Catering (416-638-6522); Le Parc and Beverley Hills Caterers (416-798-7246); Paradise Banquet Centre (416-661-6612); Tri Elm Catering (416-222-1230).

What to get...what to get?

Registries simplify process

By ERIC LAYMAN
Special to the CJN

More and more couples are using a registry to choose their bridal gifts. Both Hilary Jones of Conway & Gower (416-923-7003) and Shanithah Kachan of William Ashley China (416-964-2900) offer reasons for this.

A registry, Jones explains, lets the bride and groom, decide exactly what they want for their new home. It simplifies things for friends and family, directing them what to buy and how much.

By letting them know what has already been bought, it also eliminates unnecessary duplication and "white elephants." After the wedding, the registry's list also makes it easier to write thank you notes.

If you are moving directly from your parents' home, you want to make sure you start your first household with things you will love. If you have lived on your own, are coming out of an earlier marriage or have lived with your spouse-to-be for some years, you may already have much of what you want, but your wedding guests will probably not know what to get you. In any case, both you and your guests benefit from a registry.

Look for stores which offer the fullest possible services to registry customers, Kachan advises. Jones points out that free gift wrapping and delivery are standard services and many stores also offer discounts and free gifts. Moreover, both Jones and Kachan identify a trend to broaden the range of registerable gifts, to include items like dining-room furniture.

Going to a store for a preliminary look is good, Kachan says; shop around before making a commitment. Then make an appointment with a consultant and do your planning while you're relaxed, when decisions come easier.

Pick a store where you feel comfortable, Jones advises; and don't feel overawed, rushed or under pressure. Sound out the staff: are they knowledgeable? The wider the range of choices to make, Kachan says, the more valuable a consultant is.

Is the staff sensitive to the stress you are under? After all, Kachan says, choosing can be intimidating, especially when it comes to formal dinnerware. Registering is meant to relieve this stress, and make the experience fun.

The patterns you pick now, you may well be living with for 30 years or more. Do you want immediate or lasting appeal?

As long as the wares bear a quality brand name, simpler is better for timelessness and easy matching with other things. This is especially so for silver and china, less so for glass.

Start with dinnerware, Kachan suggests, then go to flatware and crystal. Choose formal ware first, as it's harder, then go to casual. And pick a variety of items in various price ranges.

Register at least six months before the wedding date, Jones advises. This allows all the presents to arrive at the same time.

Kachan recommends registering as soon as possible after the engagement, before the invitations are mailed. This is important because many things, like 12-piece sets, have to be ordered.

Choosing your tableware is a serious matter, but it can also be enjoyable. The services of a registry allow you to taste that enjoyment more fully.

DESSERTS:

Saving the best for last

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to the CJN

The dessert may come last, but it's certainly not least in importance. Lets face it, no matter how good the food is at a simchah, the piece de resistance comes at the end of the meal.

The spontaneous ooohing and awing are usually triggered by the sight of the sweet table in full caloric splendor, with its rich and luscious mousses, cakes, tortes, petits fours, squares and chocolate.

Many caterers rely on companies that specialize in desserts for the grand finale. Increasingly they are turning to places like Delectables, a new kosher dessert company, and My Zaidy's Bakery, both under the supervision of the Kashruth Council of the Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto (COR), to tantalize taste buds at a simchah or special event.

Chaya Ungar and Iris Halpert, co-owners of Delectables (416–782–5055), opened at 3197 Bathurst St. in March. Ungar, who comes from a Hungarian background, said she "always dabbled in the kitchen" and learned the art of making fine continental pastry from family members. "I had a knack for baking."

> Cakes were outstanding

The mother of three said she had "absolutely no interest in going into business," but she began getting so many requests for her cakes within the Orthodox community, that she started a part-time baking business to accommodate community members.

Through word of mouth, Halpert, a mother of four, became Ungar's customer when she ordered two cakes for her husband's birthday party.

"The cakes were outstanding," she recalls.

The two women struck up a partnership agreement on the day they met. They're a perfect business match, they say. Ungar is the baking maven, while Halpert specializes in marketing and new product creation.

Both women stress that their baked goods are top quality made of the finest ingredients – from the margarine they import from New York to the European chocolate.

"We use the type of ingredients you would find at home: canola oil, fresh fruit, no preservatives, no filling."

They can't use any commercial products like pre-cracked eggs to shorten their prep time because many of those products are not kosher, they note.

But the two women aren't looking to cut corners, because they have set out to create the finest kosher pastry in the city, they say.

"We started from home and we want to retain that home-baked quality."

However, they do use the most up to date equipment to enhance the production and they can get a specialty cake ready in three hours, if need be Halpert says. But she prefers to get at least 24 hours notice whenever possible. All Delectables cakes, which start at $40, must be ordered in advance.

The women can also help plan a sweet table. They offer a wide moment, and has a feeling for when it will come, Salzman recommends that to make sure those moments are captured, you clue the videographer in on every aspect of your event, but a skilled professional will also be on the alert for the unexpected.

Sager attributes 90 percent of his work to referrals, and agrees with Salzman that they are good pointers to follow. Check a videographer's reputation with previous clients, Salzman advises – and with other professionals who work at parties. Anyone who is good will tell you not to take his word for it, but to check others' opinions.

As to budget, Sager estimates, you can get good simchah videography for between $1,925 to $2,000. Book as far in advance as you can, if you want the best, there's no such thing as too early.

selection of pastries and cakes which include a 16-layer triangle cake with chocolate cream, chestnut, chocolate espresso fudge and mocha cakes, Swiss chocolate (one of their most popular cakes), as well as a large section of cookies, bar and squares, tarts, strudels and coffee cakes.

Further north on Bathurst Street in Thornhill, My Zaidy's Bakery (905-731-3831) creates fine desserts to please the most discerning of palates. Terry Samuels, owner for the last year and a half, runs a kosher dessert catering service and prides himself on offering his clientele new and different sweet table items like a walnut cake and different flavored mousses.

My Zaidy's is known especially for its spectacular wedding and bar/bat mitzvah cakes, Samuels notes.

"We make a wedding cake to be savored, not just to be looked at," he says.

In fact, he suggests using a different flavored cake for every tier so guests will come back for seconds. For bar/bat mitzvah cakes, the scroll can be a different flavor than the main cake, he adds.

Some of the most popular specialty cake flavors are chocolate mousse, a chocolate sponge cake with a rich chocolate mousse filling, strawberry shortcake made with fresh strawberries, or double mocha, a mocha sponge cake with mocha cream filling. Samuels advises people to try something different like tiramisu, an Italian cream cake.

The hosts of the simchah can cut down on the cost of the sweet table by serving a gourmet wedding or bar/bat mitzvah cake, which can also serve as a centrepiece.

Samuels consults with the hosts to make sure these cakes complement the sweet table and are coordinated with the color theme of the party. The shape of the cake can also be matched to the theme.

Samuels praised the work of Andre Sziligyi, the European-trained head pastry chef who oversees the baking as well as the design of the cakes; he has over 35 years of experience with more than half that time spent in Canada.

"He's been with My Zaidy's since it opened in 1990," Samuels notes. "He's very familiar with the needs of the clientele and he is always taking courses to keep abreast of new techniques."

One of the newest products is decorice, a mouldable icing like marzipan, but made without nuts. All the sponge cakes are made with out allergens like peanut oil, he adds.

While most cakes are pareve, he says he can make a cheese cake with chalav Yisrael cream cheese for dairy meals. Bar/bat mitzvah cakes start at $70 for a slab cake and wedding cakes start at $200. All prices include delivery.

"A lot of places have cakes that look good but don't necessarily taste good," Samuels says. "Our cakes look great, but they taste even better than they look."

That's entertainment:

Agencies liven up anyone's simchah

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to the CJN

The food may be wonderful and the decor creative, but it's often the entertainment that makes a party memorable.

Fallis and McGuin and Associates Inc., a talent agency representing performers including actors, musicians, magicians, DJs, MCs, comedians and clowns, has a large selection of entertainers for all age groups, says Carole Weiner, a musical agent for the company. "We can offer anything to anybody."

Would you like to invite some celebrity guests to your simchah? If the real Princess Di or Michael Jackson can't make it, you can choose their double from the company's large roster of impersonators.

Fallis and McGuin represent many versatile bands and musicians that play everything from top hits to celtic and Klezmer music to suit any simchah or special event, Weiner says. For children's parties she also suggests entertainers such as clowns, magicians or a jugglers.

One act she recommends for older children and adults is a versatile illusionist duo named Barbie and Ken: he cuts Barbie in half and does levitation.

There are no set price ranges for the individual acts, Weiner explains. "We work within people's budgets and try to find someone within the range. The entertainers have different scales depending on the time and day of a booking; sometimes they might opt to work for less money, she explains.

The company represents a large number of children's musical entertainers who can be booked for parties and fundraising events. They include the Simple Tones, Lenny Graf and Doug Barr, in addition to clowns, comic jugglers and mime artists. They even represent a Sumo wrestler who has been quite the novelty at some bar mitzvahs, Weiner says.

Fallis and McGuin do party planning and coordinating, with agents like herself available to help plan the entertainment to suit the party theme, she says. "We try to bill ourselves as one stop–shopping for all your entertainment needs."

Hart Entertainment (416–762–2200) represents musicians and magicians, but it is also Ontario's largest rental service for party equipment. The warehouse located at 130 Industry St., Unit 14, in the Black Creek Drive area, carries everything from candy floss machines and antique hot dog carts to inflatable castles, pitching cages and black jack tables.

Hart Entertainment president David Hart boasts that he has one of the most complete collections of inflatable rental equipment in the country, from inflatible slides to a hockey slap-shot cage.

The company can rent items that would keep any bar/ bat mitzvah party in high gear.

One popular rental, the Bungee-run, was recently used at a bar mitzvah held at the Bathurst Jewish Centre. The game is 35 feet long with two bungee cords. Two people get hooked up and run. The runner who gets the furthest wins, as they gently flip horizontally within an area bounded by soft inflated walls when they bounce with the cord.

The Bungee-run, which costs $725 to rent, has also been used at shul Purim parties, says Hart. This rental can be used for fundraising, as can the two-storey inflatable slide which rents for $1395, with the price covering delivery, set-up and two operators, he adds.

He says he is constantly adding to his equipment, attending trade shows and amusement park conventions to check out the latest products. Right now he stocks more than 1,000 different items. Party consultants approach Hart for new and unusual rentals, visiting his interactive showroom which is open to the public, he adds.

Sumo wrestling, where people don pads that turn them into wrestlers and challenge a second opponent – also dressed in the same padded gear – is fun to watch, Hart says. "People wearing the gear have trouble getting up." This rental, which includes a soft ring mat, delivery and a supervisor starts at $650.

Other popular rentals include a push-button polaroid booth which takes four-shot pictures, and rents for $495, with a large supply of film included; a portable mini-golf course, ranging from $125 to $795 for the one- and nine-hole course respectively; a portable batting cage for $795 or an inflatable pitching cage for $650.

There are a few machines – snow-cone, candy floss, theatre pop corn – that can be rented without an operator to reduce the rental charge to $275. The cost can also be further reduced to

Parties Deluxe:

Now adults can have fun too

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Special to The CJN

Who says that children have to have all the fun at parties? Several Toronto-area party places have the facilities for adults and children alike to have a great time.

When Alison Post and Shari Koffman tell people they're fired, they have a smile on their face. Owners of You're Fired...(905-737-8944), a 5-month-old paint-yourself ceramic store, they specializes in helping adults and children create ceramic works of art.

Budding artists, who either come in alone or with a party, choose their own piece, which ranges from dinnerware, serving plates and pasta bowls to tea pots, vases or knick-knacks, says Post.

"The pieces, all of which can be used afterwards, are cleaned and fired beforehand; so our clients can begin directly with the design.

"They then decide whether they want to use one of our stencils or draw the design themselves. Some people come in with a design they want transferred onto their piece.

"Using underglaze, available in over 100 shades, they create their own piece of work. It is left with us to put on the finishing touches, which include an additional one or two coats of glaze and the firing. The pieces, which are all non-toxic and food safe are ready for pick-up in about one week.

"We always stress that people do not have to be artists and even those who never do artwork walk away with a great piece. They are usually quite proud of it and love displaying it at home."

You're Fired...is a "wonderful place for friends to gather, for women's groups to have meetings or to hold showers or bar/bat mitzvah parties. People of all ages, including men, have a great time doing the work. We do have a party room available in which to serve guests when the artwork is done," says Post.

Adult parties, which run for three hours, cost the price of each piece plus a flat rate of $15. A child's party runs two hours and costs the price of each piece and $4 per child.

Athletes will enjoy a party at The Rinx (416-410-RINX (7469)), a 5-month-old entertainment complex complete with professional-size inline and ice skating rinks.

"We offer skate rentals, instruction, supervision and party coordinators. Guests can come with absolutely no experience and have a great time. They can even shower and change before continuing the party in our private banquet room," says owner Howard Orfus, who also owns Playtime Bowl.

The banquet room can seat 200 people and is elegantly decorated with wall sconces, carpeting and imitation trees, he says.

"It has the makings for a fun party. They can skate, or if they wish, play soccer or basketball and then relax in the banquet room."

Bowlers may wish to have a party at Playtime Bowl (416-787-7421), where guests can bowl and then have a meal or snack in one of the party rooms.

"We've had adult parties or corporations come in. People still love to bowl," says Orfus.

Novelties and parting gifts

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to the CJN

People capture the memories of their simchahs in pictures and videos, but the guests rarely get a picture as a memento of the evening.

Picture Perfect (486-5245) makes that possible with instant pic-pictures that are put into frames – some with customized art work – mounted on fridge magnets or key chains. The pictures are taken, personalized and mounted on the spot, be it a simchah, corporate party or other special event.

Robbi Lewin founded the company five years ago, after a friend from Georgia, a guest at her son's bar-mitzvah, brought a specialized polaroid camera to Toronto and created instant photography novelties at the Lewin simchah. The pictures were a real hit with all the guests, she says.

Her friend suggested that she start a similar photography business in Toronto. It's become a family affair with her husband and sons pitching in at many a party, Lewin says.

She charges by the individual pictures which are approximately 3½ by 4 inches in size. Key chains start at $5.50 and picture frames at $6.50 with additional charges for customized frames and backgrounds. They can both be personalized with the name, date, time and place of the event.

According to Lewin, the picture taking keeps the children busy and entertained, especially at bar/bat mitzvahs where kids will pose with groups of their closest friends. Choosing the background is "half the fun," but adults also enjoy the experience, she says. "When you're all dressed up for a simcha and you're looking your best you like having your picture taken."

Hunting for party novelties for children means knowing where to shop. And one of the stores that carries a large selection of youth-oriented novelty items is Marky's Warehouse (905–731–4433) at 7171 Yonge. St.,in Thornhill.

The 7,000-foot store specializing in jeans, sweats and T–shirts stocks plenty of novelty items to suit its clientele.

"We like to have the items kids are looking for and that they can afford," says Howard Esakov, co–owner of Marky's

Name necklaces in both Hebrew and English, priced from $5 (the strings and letters are sold individually) are very popular, says Esakov. He can also send staff members to make the necklaces at any simchah. "The necklaces make great Chanukah gifts," he says. He also carries a selection of rings and earrings in femo and silver starting at $4.99

A new game that's becoming the rage is go-gos priced from $1.99 Go-gos is a variation on the game jacks with plastic moulded beads in different shapes and colors; the beads are collected and traded, Esakov explains. "It's the new POG." Puppies in your pocket, tiny plastic moulded puppies, is another popular collectible.

Some other novelty gifts carried at Marky's include Loonie Tune and Timex Indiglo watch bands costing between $7.99 and $9.99; stretch gloves for $1.49; plaid and Looney Toon boxer shorts for $4.99; custom–printed T–shirts and boxer shorts priced from $7 to $10; sunglasses from $7.99 to $9.99; and iron-on patches starting at $1.99.

WJC seeks Polish restitution

By DAVID LANDAU
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

OSLO — Leaders of world Jewry are planning a frontal assault on the government of Poland at a conference here on the restitution of properties of Holocaust victims or their heirs.

The planned pressure on Poland comes as Swiss and Jewish leaders are negotiating to reach an accord on the mushrooming issue of Holocaust victims' claims against Swiss banks.

Sources at the conference, organized by the World Jewish Congress (WJC), said a deal could soon be struck under which Switzerland would hand over a sizeable lump sum early next year.

Mendel Kaplan, chair of the WJC executive, said in an interview that the decision to hold the biannual meeting of the WJC leadership in Oslo was made seven months ago.

He said it came in recognition of what he described as Norway's forthcoming posture on making restitution for properties seized from Norway's Jews during World War II.

The Norwegian government set up a commission earlier this year to study the restitution issue. The commission is scheduled to give its report in March.

The looming attack on Poland comes after Jewish leaders received a letter from Polish Prime Minister Wlodzimierz Cimoszewicz that rejected a call from two Polish Jewish groups.

The Jewish groups wanted the restitution of pre-Holocaust Jewish communal property in Poland to be made to a foundation comprising world Jewish organizations and the Supreme Court rejects funding request

By RON CSILLAG
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The Ontario Jewish community's long campaign for public funding of its 22 day schools came to a disappointing end last week with a final verdict from the Supreme Court of Canada: Negative.

The court ruled 7-2 that Ontario, which fully funds Catholic schools, is not obliged to fund private, religious-based schools, and that not even the religious equality section of the Charter of Rights can be used to press for funding.

In a decision that left other religious groups bitter and disheartened, Canada's highest court based its ruling on the "historic compromise" that led to Confederation in 1867 – from which arose a distinction between Roman Catholic and other schools "that is constitutionally mandated and cannot be the subject of a Charter attack."

Please see pages 10 and 11

The court's majority dismissed an application from five Jewish parents and the Ontario Alliance of Christian Schools, alleging that Ontario's policy of funding only Catholic schools – but not minority, religious-based schools – is discriminatory.

The court ruled that Canada's Constitution protects denominational, separate and "dissentient" schools from Charter challenges. Thus, "one part of the Constitution cannot be used to interfere with rights protected by a different part of that same document."

Writing for the majority, Mr. Justice Frank Iacobucci added that parents are not forced to send their children to private schools: "They were free to send their children to secular public schools maintained at public expense. Their decision not to do so was solely a response to their religious beliefs and not a result of any government action."

The expense involved in sending their children to religious-based schools "is a natural cost of the appellants' religion" and does not violate the Charter, the court stated.

"Not providing funding for private religious education does not infringe the freedom to educate children in accordance with religious beliefs where there is no restriction on religious schooling," the court said, in upholding lower court rulings.

The decision rests in large measure on the strength of the constitutional bargain of 1867, when it was agreed that Quebec would fund its minority Protestant schools, and Ontario fund its minority Catholic schools. The

Israeli immigrants receiving better treatment

Minister touts education as best route to integration

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter

Yuli Edelstein

TORONTO – Although the rate of professional integration of Soviet olim has not changed in the past two years, with only 30 percent of those immigrants employed in positions reflective of their training, there has been a marked change in attitude toward newcomers in Israel, according to the country's minister of immigrant absorption.

Israelis can no longer get away with disparaging comments about immigrants, said Yuli Edelstein in an interview last week.

The former Moscow Hebrew teacher and longtime refusenik, who spent three years in a Siberian labor camp before leaving for Israel in 1987, was in Toronto as a keynote speaker for Hadassah-WIZO of Canada's national convention at the Sheraton Centre Hotel.

While here he also met with representatives of B'nai Brith Canada, Canadian Jewish Congress and other groups of community leaders, as well as with the "Edel-clan," an ad hoc group of Toronto Edelsteins and Edelstones formed in the mid-80s to lobby for his release.

One of the few olim who was able to pursue his chosen profession in Israel, Edelstein worked as an educator before entering politics. Already active as a founding member of several immigrant organizations, last year he became a founder of the immigrant political party Yisrael b'Aliyah, which under the leadership of Natan Sharansky won seven Knesset seats in this year's election.

Not quite two years ago, after serving for a year as adviser to Benjamin Netanyahu, Edelstein was quoted in the Jerusalem Report as saying that veteran Israeli politicians "go around defaming us."

A recent incident offers evidence that the atmosphere has changed, he told The CJN. An Israeli retail chain found itself in hot water after a local newspaper obtained a letter written by one of the chain's directors, in which he blamed the large number of immigrant employees for damaging the store's image, said Edelstein.

Damage control in the form of paid ads saying "how much they love new immigrants" ensued, and Edelstein is convinced the situation won't arise again.

For him and an estimated one million immigrants who will have made aliyah between 1989 and 2000, this represents a sea change which he attributes to the immigrants' newfound political power.

Of immediate concern, Edelstein said, are the issues of professional and social integration. "It's time to try and use the potential of newcomers. It's a very complex process and should be done gradually."

A believer — not surprisingly — in the value of education as the best way to integration, Edelstein said educational issues should be addressed from kindergarten through the army. He noted that the army has been "very cooperative" in running special courses for Ethiopian immigrants and that there are already dozens of Israeli army officers of Ethiopian origin.

"[But] there's still lots of work to be done," he adds.

Private eye found Nazis: Post

By RON CSILLAG
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO – A sensational Jerusalem Post story about a New York private eye who tracked down some 140 suspected Nazi war criminals living peaceful lives in Canada should, at the very least, light a fire under government investigators, says Prof. Irving Abella.

The story "brings home to the rest of the world that despite some action, Canada has been delinquent" in punishing Nazi collaborators, Abella, chair of Canadian Jewish Congress's war crimes committee, told The CJN.

Last weekend's two-part piece in the Post described Canada as a "near-blissful refuge" for Nazis. It detailed the efforts of Steve Rambam, a 39-year-old private detective from New York, who, armed with lists supplied by the Simon Wiesenthal Centre and Yad Vashem, easily found dozens of suspected Nazi war criminals across Canada since early 1994.

The story said Rambam personally visited 80 of them, and even obtained secretly taped confessions from several, including admissions of having taken part in the killing of Jews. Others confirmed they had been active in wartime units that committed atrocities.

The two Post reporters who wrote the story went along with Rambam for about a dozen of the encounters, posing as academics from a fictitious university.

It was "not unusual" for Rambam to visit "four or five" suspects a day, having traced them down via drivers' licence registrations and property-ownership records, the story said.

In some cases, he and the reporters simply found the names in telephone books. Suspects' names were often displayed in apartment lobbies.

Among those interviewed by Rambam were Antanas Kenstavicious of Hope, B.C., who is accused of personally murdering three Jews in Svencionya, Lithuania, where he had been chief of police.

Kenstavicious, whom Ottawa intends to deport for concealing his past, graphically described how Jewish men, women and children were rounded, stripped naked and gunned down into ditches until there were "no more Jews."

Abella said he hopes the story "embarrasses the country, the government and the judiciary."

Adapting to deficit reduction policies

The General Assembly of the Council of Jewish Federations is a wonderful opportunity to meet those active in Jewish life. The gathering two weeks ago in Seattle attracted approximately 3,000 participants from all over the world including a small number from Israel, the former Soviet Union and South America.

The vast majority of the participants were from all sizes of communities within the United States. As a result, the myriad overlay of seminar and workshop programming throughout the five days was geared primarily to the concerns and issues confronting the American organized Jewish world.

Nevertheless, there were a number of interesting and thoughtful programs designed by CJF-Canada specifically for the 160 participants from Canada.

One such program was entitled All Politics is Local – Federation response to social policy shifts across Canada. It dealt with the need by all communities to adapt to recent deficit-reduction policies by all levels of government.

The discussion was carried by a four person panel: Eli Rubinstein, spiritual leader of Habonim Congregation in Toronto, provided the biblical context for Jewish community involvement in general.

Irving Abella, professor of history at York University and past president of Canadian Jewish Congress, provided a historical context to the discussion of past Jewish involvement in community matters as well as a reading of current attitudes of the younger Jewish generation toward community involvement.

Maxyne Finkelstein, director of community planning, FEDERATION CJA in Montreal, and Morris Zbar, planning and allocations director of the Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto, provided practical insights from their vantage points "on the ground," as it were, dealing with day to day as well as the strategic, long range issues of the two largest federations in Canada.

'Are we paying the price for our success'

Finkelstein described the experiences over the past 10 years of a number of distinct social service institutions in Montreal's community with united social policy lobbying.

In her view, the federations have no choice but to become involved in social issues, to lobby government as one voice even though the individuals who are part of that one voice often must cope with potential "conflicts" in their loyalties to the federation, the institution that they represent and the collective lobbying voice on which they serve. In the future, federations will be more involved in political activism and of necessity reach out in a network of cross involvements with other social action groups.

Zbar was equally emphatic. He spoke with an urgency wrought by the two severe budget cuts made last year by the Ontario government. "Only the federation movement," he said, "can deal with the crisis unfolding in the social and human services area." The task of the federations was to ensure that the local, ethno-specific infrastructure survives. To do this, Zbar called upon federations to develop skills and expertise that to this point in Jewish communal history had been exercised only at the national communal institutions: government relations, coalition-building, advocacy, and social policy planning.

This will mean reforming and adapting (i.e. somehow amalgamating) existing community structures and institutions (i.e. Congress, CJF and the federations) to enable them to respond more effectively (i.e. pre-emptive rather than responsive political lobbying) to changing times (i.e. severely reduced funding from federal, provincial and even municipal governments).

Abella took participants on a "tour" of the history of Jewish involvement in community life and in relations with government. Starting with the earliest settlers in the 1760s, Abella said, " Jews were always involved in philanthropy and in public policy. Shtadlanut (private Jewish representation to the government on behalf of the community) dates to the very beginning of the Jewish community in Canada."

This evolved to the "very significant contributions" to helping shape progressive public policy made by the Jewish trade unions and then by the Canadian Jewish Congress. Though ironically, Abella added, as the community grew, its influence weakened.

"The turning point for all of us was World War II. Lobbying became more aggressive, though not too aggressive, for after all we are still Canadians.

"The survivors' generation provided backbone to an often supine Jewish community.

"In the '50s and the '60s Jewish lobbying started to be felt in the fields of social policy and then...in the adoption of the official policy on multiculturalism."

But whereas the older generation had demonstrated a commitment to the "Jewish values" of involvement and caring and compassion in social policy, Abella fears that the younger generation seems to be increasingly turning away from those paths and the values that line them.

At a recent young leadership meeting at which he spoke, he noticed that there was no particular interest in the "Jewish" positions on such touchstone issues as immigration, multiculturalism, the social safety net or human rights.

"Are we paying the price for our success? Have we become too complacent through our affluence?

"Is the younger generation so engrossed in the bottom line that they won't have the time to look up from their ledger sheets?", Abella asked, more painfully than rhetorically.

"We must train a younger generation," he continued, "to start to behave as Jews, with caring, commitment, compassion and conscience. The best weapon against intolerance is tolerance."

Abella's words animated the discussion. And the questions he raised were most appropriate and even, I would say, among the most perfect, at the 65th general assembly of those active in Jewish life. MBD

WIZO chair urges women to do community work

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The chair of World WIZO has a message for young women. It's not enough to have a career, says Michal Modai, a stylish grandmother of four and onetime Miss Israel. "One needs to know that she's part of a community and doing for the community – and as Jews it's not just the local community. It's Israel."

A keynote speaker at Hadassah-WIZO of Canada's national convention, held recently at the Sheraton Centre Hotel, Modai, a seventh-generation Sabra, lauded the efforts of Canadian members to support a "vast array" of projects in Israel.

"Your day care centres provide a caring environment to thousands of babies and toddlers," she told the 500 convention participants. Women's shelters, youth clubs and schools were among the other Canadian projects she mentioned.

WIZO, represented in 52 countries, has 800 such projects in Israel and is active in lobbying the Knesset to change legislation on issues such as alimony, workplace equality and insurance for homemakers. Currently there are seven proposals for new laws before the Knesset, she said.

Modai herself established one of the first battered women's shelters in Israel almost two decades ago "when people did not discuss this openly," she said in an interview. An estimated 200,000 women and 660,000 children in Israel are affected by domestic violence.

She became committed to being active in WIZO when she saw "what a movement like WIZO can do to change the lives of so many poor people. It gave me the challenge to continue and accept more and more responsible roles later on," she told The CJN.

Joining WIZO was natural for her, she added, having had family role models

"My grandmother did not belong to any organization, but she was a real volunteer. She used to help people by making herbal medicines for those who needed them. She cooked from Wednesday to Friday to have food to bring to homeless people in the synagogue. She never told me, 'You have to be a volunteer,' but that wonderful example she set, very quietly, very discreetly, was always in the back of my mind.

Michal Modai

"My mother, too, was always very discreetly helping brides, doing all kinds of things. I saw this as a child and accepted it as a natural thing."

A panel on the Changing Role of Women Affecting Volunteerism, which followed Modai's talk, addressed some of the issues she raised in the interview.

Panelists Taylor Hogge, Judy Feld Carr and Wendy Eisen – three of eleven Women of Achievement honored at the convention – discussed their own volunteer experiences.

"One person can change an existing situation," said Feld Carr, known for her role in the rescue of Syrian Jews. "I am convinced if women have a desire to contribute meaningfully to the destiny of our people, it is within their hands to achieve that contribution."

Taylor Hogge, a non-Jewish American who spends several months a year working with immigrant teens at WIZO's Hofim school, confessed that "what began as a well-intentioned trip from an aging hippie to help needy Ethiopians living away from their parents, has become an exercise in selfishness."

If a project is expensive, ask for money, Hogge advised. "If you don't have the time, make the time. You will never do anything that enhances your life more."

Eisen, former chair of the Canadian Jewish Congress committee for Soviet Jewry, stressed the need for women to act as role models in the interest of continuity.

"I think it's important that we tell our children and grandchildren what's important. Hang up your plaques on the wall. Tell your kids what you're doing. It's not enough to say, 'We're going to a meeting.' It's what we do at the meeting and why."

"I don't call it a problem, I call it a challenge," said panel moderator Gillian Horwitz, referring to the multiple demands on women's time that make it difficult for some to volunteer.

Redemption dawning?

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO – Belief that the Jewish people are at the dawn of redemption "may be an incitement to fanaticism" suggested Rabbi Steven Saltzman of Adath Israel Synagogue, moderator of a debate held at the synagogue.

Arguing that Israel represents the dawn of redemption, Rabbi Wayne Allen of Beth Tikvah Synagogue said classical sources, the miraculous nature of events and the kind of life now being lived in Israel support his belief.

On the other hand, Prof. Martin Lockshin of York University declared: "I would like to see Israel making decisions based on evidence other than that these are Messianic times; that is a somewhat dangerous determination."

The arrival of the Messiah and the dawn of redemption are two separate events, Rabbi Allen stated, arguing that redemption might come even before "the final ingathering of the exiles, when the Messiah will, or will not appear."

Lockshin who described himself as a religious Zionist, said, "I feel that something miraculous has happened, but it doesn't mean redemption is with us. I worry about depending too much on our connection with Israel."

Rabbi Saltzman asked Rabbi Allen if he was underestimating the incitement to violence, referring to the massacre of Arabs by Baruch Goldstein and the assassination of Yitzhak Rabin.

"There are always people who will abuse the concept," replied Rabbi Allen.

Waterloo Jewish studies gets major donation

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO - A Toronto developer has donated $500,000 for a chair in Jewish Studies at the University of Waterloo.

The university received the gift from Joe Lebovic, president of Lebovic Enterprises and past president of the Urban Development Institute of Canada, a few weeks ago through the Joseph and Wolf Lebovic Foundation.

The donation brings to $522,000 the university has gotten since the fundraising campaign was launched in 1995.

The university is seeking between $1.5 million to $2 million, said Paul Socken, a member of the university's advisory committee and a professor of French literature. Once this sum has been raised, the chair can be established, he added.

The chair is to be called the Lebovic Chair in Jewish Studies. But Lebovic is willing to share the name with a donor who donates an equal amount.

Since 1995, the university has accepted $200,000 from Alexander Raab of Toronto; $100,000 from Charles Bronfman and his family in Montreal; $100,000 from Martin Levine of Kitchener and $100,000 from Don Bierstock and his family in Waterloo.

In addition, the university has collected $22,000 from some 24 smaller donors , Socken disclosed.

Lebovic and Bierstock, co-chairs of the fundraising drive, want to wind it up this year, Socken said. "They feel it's definitely feasible."

Lebovic, a Czech Jew and a Holocaust survivor, immigrated to Canada in 1949 via Britain.

He said he had been approached recently by Socken and several university officials.

He said the occupant of the chair will disseminate Jewish philosophy, morals and principles. "Jewish people have something to gain from that," he observed in an interview.

In a related development, the University of Waterloo intends to link up with the Canadian Friends of Hebrew University for joint fundraising and student and faculty exchanges.

As well, the Centre for Jewish Studies at York University has decided to offer its courses to the University of Waterloo's distance education format, thereby enabling students across Canada to take its courses.

"We're the largest distributor of (university) correspondence courses in Canada" said Socken.

Understanding Holocaust seen as essential to grasp Israel's psyche

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Special to the CJN

TORONTO – Israel's psyche cannot be grasped unless there is an understanding of the Holocaust, says the executive director of the America-Israel Public Affairs Committee (AIPAC).

"One must realize how the world would have been different had the homeland been created a mere 10 years earlier," Neal Sher said at the 1997 UJA Federation Major Gifts and Atarah Event.

Sher, former director of the U.S. justice department's Office of Special Investigations, was responsible for the investigation of Kurt Waldheim, the removal of a series of Nazi prosecutors from the United States and the commencement of over 100 prosecutions against suspected Nazi war criminals.

The work enabled him to see the role of the individual.

"We think of six million people when we think of the Holocaust and that has a dehumanizing impact because we do not see the faces. These trials bring home the fact that the Holocaust was a series of events where individuals killed individuals.

"If our history has taught us anything, if we are to learn from the slaughter of women and children, then we must redouble our commitment to Israel. There is only one Israel, and that is the safe haven for Russian and Ethiopian Jews. I would much rather devote our resources to save people now than have to build monuments to destroyed Jewish communities 50 years from now."

Neal Sher

Jews are a people of history and memory, he said, and "we cannot afford to lose sight of our tragic past. My mentor, Elie Wiesel, said, 'A Jew without a past is less than a Jew. If we do not have a sense of history then we cannot escape the lessons of history.'

"There was never a serious effort to rescue Jews in Europe and there is a lesson that every Jew in every free society must take away from this. The American and Canadian Jewish communities were politically impotent. They wanted to stay back and not rock the boat. They had a 'sha, sha' mentality."

Jews must learn from this lesson, he said, and commit to ensuring that it never happens again. "Go up to lawmakers and argue and push about issues you care deeply about. I have never felt prouder as a Jew or as an American than when I have done that."

Major Gifts and Atarah Event chairs were Karen and Paul Morton and Joanne and Miles Nadal. Major gifts cabinet chairs were Norman Godfrey and David Green. Atarah chairs were Marilyn Gold, Maryka Weisz and Carole Herman Zucker. Campaign chair is David Goldstein.

Mideast terrorism mentality called a mystery to Westerners

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Special to the CJN

TORONTO – Westerners fail to understand the mentality involved in Middle East terrorism, says an author of books about Israeli intelligence affairs and special operations.

JEWISH BOOK FAIR

"Middle East terrorism cannot be mastered through book learning. One has be to born and bred there to be anything close to an expert," Steven Hartov, author of The Nylon Hand of God, told an audience at the 20th annual Jewish Book Fair.

Eliminating the point-man involved in the terrorist act, says Hartov, is merely a stop-gap effort. "It is necessary to try and change the hearts and minds of the populace that supports it. Terrorism seems to become a way of life in itself and long-term terrorists often redefine their goals in order that they not be met. Otherwise, they would be out of work."

Targeting the lowest ranking terrorists is non-productive "because that only creates heros and martyrs and leaves a space to fill the ranks with more. It is those who train the terrorists who must be made to realize that their actions carry a price," he said. "That would need approval, however, of the legislative bodies in the west. Israel, although tough, still has to live in the neighborhood."

In response to a question from the audience, Hartov said the media could play a role in counter terrorism.

"If not well publicized, terrorist acts have no effect. Objectivity in the media is rare, however, and they are always willing to sensationalize, which makes them unwilling to cooperate. As far as that is concerned the media is a hopeless venue," he said.

Asked if Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu is interested in negotiating with Iran, Hartov replied that outreach is only one-sided. "The only reason Israel has made noises is because of one Israeli pilot that it is trying to get back. Much of the contact is based on him."

The lecture was sponsored by Aid to Disabled Veterans of Israel, Beit Halochem Canada, New Leadership chapter.

Men must be equal with women in home: author

By SIDURA LUDWIG
Special to The CJN

TORONTO – Men need to be brought into the home not as help, but as equal partners with women, said feminist author Anne Roiphe.

"Yes, they will resist," she said. "But that's because they don't know how happy they'll be."

JEWISH BOOK FAIR

At the recent 20th annual Jewish Book Fair, Roiphe, author of Fruitful! – A Real Mother in the Modern World, spoke on Family Values and the Feminist Vision Feminism, Motherhood and the Fathering Issue.

She called her new book a combination of "personal anecdote and political essays." It is based on her experiences of raising her children and step-children in both single parent and blended family situations.

Roiphe described herself as both a "Jewish feminist and a feminist Jew," which, she said, "are part of the same thing."

Her own feminist values stem from her teenage years in New York watching her younger brother prepare for his bar mitzvah. Although she described her family as assimilated, her brother took his Hebrew studies very seriously and furthermore, learned Yiddish, kept kosher and eventually considered becoming a rabbi. But she was discouraged from learning Hebrew.

"I was offended," she said. "Because he clearly had something that meant a great deal to him that I didn't have. It took many years for me to understand what he had and how I could get it too."

Roiphe said that in the early days of the feminist movement, women were offended by the stereotype that they were only good for domestic work.

Because of this, she said, "We made a bad tactical and political mistake – we stopped talking about motherhood."

Instead, the feminist movement focused its energies on discussing their outrage at male crimes, such as abuse, harassment and rape. The result, she said, is that "we have pushed men away at the moment when we need them."

Where at one time Gloria Steinam's quote, "A woman needs a man like a fish needs a bicycle," was a slogan for the feminist movement, Roiphe said the statement only applies to part of a woman's life.

"A woman doesn't need a man when it comes to going through medical school," she said. "[But] a woman needs a man if she wants to have a child. And two incomes are better than one, two nurturers are better than one."

Roiphe also reflected on the feminist movement's rejection of Freud's theory that anatomy is destiny.

"Sometimes anatomy is destiny," she said. She gave the example of women who choose to start having children later in life.

Roiphe also noted that the loss of fertility is particularly devastating for the Jewish community, which has a low birthrate.

Yet even when women try to balance a career and family, many experience a double edged guilt.

"They feel guilty if they work too much," she said, "and they feel guilty if they stay at home."

One young mother in the audience pointed out that she and her husband were equal partners in both income and parenting. "So why," she asked, "do I feel guilty when my 3-year-old goes to his father when he gets hurt?"

Roiphe replied that "the definitions of mother and father need to mutate...we need to teach women to give up some of their role [as caregiver]."

Consider intelligence, and the role it plays in choosing a margarine. Picking up a mono-flavoured brand takes no thought whatever. But four?

You accommodate the different tastes of everyone in the family, proving your genius yet again.

There you have it. Four mouth-watering varieties, and endless reasons to want them. Not that much fridge room? With your brains you'll find a way.

You are prepared, even if your recurring nightmare comes true and Martha does, in fact, drop by.

Deep disappointment

The law has finally been settled.The Supreme Court has rendered judgment. In a 7-2 split decision, the court decided that the Charter of Rights and Freedoms does not require Ontario to treat all religious communities equally to its treatment of the Roman Catholic community regarding the funding of the general studies portion of private school education.

We accept and abide by the decision, as we must. But we express our deep disappointment as also we must.

The majority of the court determined that Ontario's full funding of Roman Catholic separate schools was a result of the "historical compromise" crucial to Confederation. Because of this, the Ontario government's funding practice toward the Catholic schools could not be impugned. But this reasoning misses, almost entirely, the main thrust of the community's argument. The nub of the grievance against the government is not in the 12-year-old decision to extend full funding to the Catholic schools, but rather, in its constant refusal to extend any funding to other religious schools. The "historic compromise" was never the object of attack but rather the basis of comparison. The argument by the non-Catholic communities rests on fairness not on history.

If individual Ontarians were to behave as their provincial government does, namely, discriminating on the basis of religion, they would be brought to account; they would meet the full justice of the law, and rightly so, for "[E]very person has a right to equal treatment with respect to services...without discrimination because of...creed..." This is not simply a noble sentiment, it is the very first provision of the Human Rights Code of Ontario. But the conduct of the government towards the non-Catholic schools seems not even to contradict the Human Rights Code.

There is however, one argument in particular for continuing the unfair treatment, which we feel compelled to answer. Simply put, the argument holds that education in religious schools is somehow an impediment to fostering a common Canadian identity. The argument is fallacious and, in a sense, offensive.

It is fallacious because it ignores the fact that six other provinces already provide some public funding to private, religious schools without any fear whatsoever that the graduates will turn out, somehow, less Canadian. It ignores the fact that the general studies curriculum is established by ministry officials and follows provincial (Canadian) guidelines. But worse, the underlying premise of the argument, namely, that the religious component of the education will likely lead to exclusionist behavior by the graduates from those schools, panders to the most unforgiving stereotypes.

Jewish Canadians are as proud of their Canadianism as is any other identifiable group in this country. Our commitment to Canada's well-being is not less than that of any Canadians. And our contribution to Canada's development, prosperity and social justice since our arrival to her shores have been of equal vigor to that of any other group that dwells here. Is our attachment to this country diminished in any way by our millennial attachment to the values, traditions, customs, and religious practices of the Jewish faith or by our desire to transmit that faith to our children?

Does anyone question the attachment of Catholics to Canada on account of their attachment to their faith? Are Catholic children less Canadian for having graduated from Catholic schools? The very notion is absurd.

Is the definition of "Canadian" so meagre in Ontario that it cannot also include the desire and the equal opportunity to perpetuate one's faith? What the religious communities understand, including the Catholic community, is that the definition of Canada is sufficiently expansive and sufficiently exhilarating to embrace the diverse faiths of all who live here and who strive with all their might to build and to benefit this great, bounteous land.

Dry Bones

This Week in Canadian Jewish History

Nov. 28, 1949 Paul Shaffer was born in Thunder Bay, Ontario. Since 1982 he has been the band leader for Late Night/The Late Show with David Letterman. (Canadian Jewish Agenda, CJC 1995)

Roux opened can of worms

Like the hero of a Greek tragedy, Jean-Louis Roux's fall from grace was partially his own doing. His candor led to his downfall, a fatal mistake in politics. But he left the political stage, with its back stabbing and treasonous villains, graciously, in a sequence of events that resembled a bad adaptation of Hamlet. This episode proved one thing: that something is rotten in Quebec politics. The swiftness of scandal and the virulence of the politically motivated denunciation and accusations against Roux would make even Machiavelli's head spin.

The attacks against Roux reek of a McCarthy-era witch-hunt, something orchestrated by overzealous and opportunistic politicians. It is no secret that many of Quebec's intellectual elites sympathized overtly or secretly with Nazi ideology during World War II, yet for some strange reason none decried or denounced these right-wing ideologues. Because they were Quebec nationalists, their political affiliations of dubious merit were largely overlooked and swept into the dustbin of history.

Was Roux forced to resign because he flirted with fascism, or because he was a member of the opposing camp and an ardent federalist? Was Roux simply a convenient scapegoat, who was targeted by the Parti Québécois in an attempt to discredit Ottawa? In that sense, the Roux affair had all the elements of a televised mini-series. It was a blatant attempt at character assassination.

This coup de théâtre in Roux's political career is a sad story that also says much about the artistic community which chose to remain silent throughout these events. None of his colleagues from the theatre have yet spoken out in support of one of their own. Roux, whatever his inclination during the war years, regardless of his past or his federalist convictions, was and still is a great artist and a man of the theatre. Roux was left alone in those agonizing and humiliating days.

His resignation was not only a bitter personal blow to the man who personalized French-Canadian theatre for decades, but to the entire artistic community of Quebec as well.

All that Roux has done for Quebec theatre over the decades, has been ignored and forgotten. Art is supposed to be above politics. But not in Quebec it seems.

Call them what they were – murder camps

The term "Holocaust" is gradually being displaced by the term "Shoah."

Similarly, it has occurred to me that the expression concentration camp has been overused and has lost its impact as a means of indicating why the Jews, and others, were "concentrated" in this way. I suggest that murder camps is a much stronger, more meaningful and appropriate description of the unspeakable agony and deaths suffered by the human victims incarcerated there.

Men are victims too

On Nov. 8, I attended a meeting at the Jewish Public Library in Montreal dealing with Yiddish women writers. I enjoyed the Yiddish content and the singing, but was shocked and distraught by the hidden agenda, namely, militant feminism.

In poem after poem men were vilified as seducers, kidnappers, wife-beaters, heartless oppressors. Marriage was captivity enforced on helpless female victims and death was often preferable.

I waited and waited for one redeeming kind word for man as a devoted, truly loving husband and father. It was as if that were a different species that did not exist.

I do not question that women have valid grounds for self-assertion and have been victimized. But the bias in the compilation of material was overwhelming. Men, too, suffer – even at the hands of women and sometimes mothers taking their revenge on their hapless sons. I would also make references to Keats' poem La Belle Dame Sans Merci, which describes a heartless woman destroying her entrapped lovers.

Surrounded by a mainly female audience, I felt like standing up and in a clarion voice proclaiming: "Peace – Now!"

The funding debate: a chronology of 12 years

June, 1984: Premier William Davis reverses long-standing policy and announces the province will extend public funding to Catholic schools past grade 10 to include grades 11, 12, and 13. Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) hails the move as "a positive and long-needed adjustment," and a first step toward the same treatment for Jewish day schools. At the same time, Davis appoints educator Bernard Shapiro to study the future of private schools.

September, 1984: CJC's Ontario region sets up the Ontario Jewish Association for Equity in Education (OJAEE) to lobby the government for funding of Jewish day schools.

January, 1985: OJAEE formally calls on the government to fund the general studies program in Jewish day schools, based on a per-pupil allocation. Later estimates say the cost of funding the secular portion of studies would be $25 million to $30 million annually.

July, 1985: The new Liberal government of David Peterson introduces Bill 30, which implements funding for all Catholic grades.

October, 1985: In his report to the government, Shapiro calls Bill 30 discriminatory and recommends that Queen's Park funds private schools, provided they meet acceptable criteria. The Shapiro Report says funding Ontario's 551 private/independent schools would cost about $75 million a year.

February, 1986: In a 3-2 ruling, the Ontario Court of Appeal says Bill 30 is constitutional. The court says financing private schools would require a constitutional amendment, adding that educational rights granted at Confederation "make it impossible to treat all Canadians fairly." The decision is appealed to the Supreme Court of Canada.

June, 1987: In a 7-0 decision, the Supreme Court of Canada rules Bill 30 is constitutional. Saying funding of Catholic schools was part of the historic compromise that led to Confederation, the court rules that relevant provisions of the Charter of Rights and Freedoms do not override the constitutional bargain arrived at in 1867. But the court says nothing about funding other religious schools, leaving the door open to political and further legal action.

April, 1991: Five Jewish parents, the OJAEE and the Ontario Alliance of Christian Schools, representing parents of children in private Protestant schools, launch legal action against Ontario's education and health ministries, arguing that funding Catholic schools but not other religious schools violates the Charter of Rights. The action comes to be known as the Adler case, after Susie Adler, one of the parents.

August, 1992: Mr. Justice William Anderson of the Ontario Court (General Division) rules that the five parents' rights to religious freedom and equality under the Charter were being violated. However, he adds that such rights are subject to reasonable limits, and in this case, the "impairment.is within permissible limits." The ruling is appealed.

July, 1994: Ontario's Court of Appeal unanimously dismisses the parents' case, saying their Charter rights were not violated. In a related decision, the court rules 4-1 against the provision of funded health care services in Jewish day schools.

February, 1996: Toronto parent Arieh Waldman takes the case to the United Nations' Human Rights Committee, alleging Canada has violated international law by refusing to fund religious schools in Ontario on an equal basis.

November, 1996: The Supreme Court of Canada rules 7-2 against the parents and upholds Ontario's right not to fund independent schools. The court finds that private religious schools cannot use the Charter of Rights to force the province to give them funding. As well, the court rules 7-2 against public funding of health services in private schools.

What the court said: excerpts from the decision

Following are excerpts from last week's Supreme Court of Canada 7-2 ruling on the funding issue. In essence, the court found that Ontario's funding of Roman Catholic schools, as required by Canada's Constitution, does not impose an obligation on the province to fund other religious-based schools in the name of equality.

The majority decision was written by Mr. Justice Frank Iacobbuci, and agreed to by four other justices. Mr. Justice John Sopinka and Mr. Justice John Major agreed, but for different reasons.

Madame Justice Beverley McLachlin dissented in part, and Madam Justice Claire L'Heureux-Dubé dissented entirely.

Agreeing:

Section 93 of the Constitution Act, 1867, is the product of a historical compromise crucial to Confederation and forms a comprehensive code with respect to denominational school rights which cannot be enlarged through...section 2(a) of the Charter [of Rights and Freedoms]. It does not represent a guarantee of fundamental freedoms. The appellants, given that they cannot bring themselves within the terms of section 93's guarantees, have no claim to public funding for their schools. To decide otherwise by accepting the appellants' claim that section 2(a) requires public funding of their dissentient religion-based schools would be to hold one section of the Constitution violative of another.

In order to claim the protection of section 93, it must be shown that there was a right or privilege with respect to denominational schooling which was enjoyed by a class of persons by law at the time of union.

Agreeing (in part):

Some overlap exists between the claims based on section 2(a) and section 15 of the Charter. Neither section is infringed even if the non-funding of private religious schools imposes an economic disadvantage in relation to parents who send their children to secular public school.

The distinction made between the Roman Catholic schools and other religious schools is constitutionally mandated and cannot be the subject of a Charter challenge. Not providing funding for private religious education does not infringe the freedom to educate children in accordance with religious beliefs when there is no restriction on religious schooling.

That the appellants feel compelled to send their children to private school because of a personal characteristic (religion), with the effect that they are unable to benefit from publicly funded schooling, is not an effect arising from the statute.

No government action compelled the appellants to send their children to private, religious-based independent schools. They were free to send their children to secular public schools maintained at public expense. Their decision not to do so was solely a response to their religious beliefs and not a result of any government action.

Madame Justice Beverly McLachlin (dissenting in part):

The argument that the section 15 equality provisions of the Charter was infringed by the unequal funding provided Roman Catholic schools was untenable given the special constitutional bargain protecting funding for Roman Catholic schools in Ontario at the time of Confederation. Section 15 was nevertheless infringed because of unequal funding vis-a-vis funded secular schools. Although the public school system is neutral on its face, the funding system nevertheless results in advance effect discrimination in that it has the effect of denying a benefit to those whose religions do not permit their adherents to send their children to public secular schools. This adverse effect discrimination is caused by the Education Act and not by the appellants' religion. The state cannot "blame" the person discriminated against for being of the status or having chosen the status which leads to the denial of benefit.

Madame Justice Claire L'Heureux-Dubé (dissenting):

The legislation creates a distinction between the appellants and others who are able to access publicly funded education in the surrounding social context. As found at trial, remaining a member of the particular religious communities in question and acting in accordance with the tenets of those faiths required that the children be educated in a manner consistent with the faith and therefore, outside of the public or Roman Catholic schools. Control over education of their children was essential to the continuation of the religious communities in question. The distinction results in the denial of the claimants' section 15 right to equal benefit of the law on the basis of their membership in an identifiable group.

State action which discriminates on the basis of religion cannot be excused on the grounds that religion is a choice and that individuals may choose to avoid the negative impact which arises from the state's response to their religious identity. Discrimination on the basis of religion would become an empty concept.

Given the complete denial of this benefit to those who cannot access it for religious reasons, the equal benefit of a publicly funded education has been denied the appellants on the basis of a distinction which relates to their membership in an identifiable group.

The distinction is capable of promoting or perpetuating a view that the appellants are, by virtue of their religious beliefs, less capable or worthy of recognition or value as human beings or members of Canadian society equally deserving of concern, respect and consideration...Denial of any funding to the appellants constitutes not only a financial prejudice but also a complete non-recognition of their children's educational needs, and the children's and parents' fundamental interest in the continuation of their faith.

Jerusalem constantly rebuilds itself

ISRAEL DIARY PART II

Jerusalem has been built and destroyed, burned and buried, resurrected and restored many times. The first city was crouched around the Gihon Spring, at the foot of the hill south of the present Temple Mount. This Jebusite city is revealing itself to the archeologist's spade, along with glimpses of first temple life and Hasmonean walls.

By Jean M. Gerber

We climb, one scorching day, along the side of the hill, looking at the remains of these cities and fortifications and peering down 40 metres into the well of the Canaanites.

We retrace our steps up to the Turkish walls surrounding the present old city and enter through the Dung Gate to the southern wall of Herod's huge temple mount. We are now on steps that the Levites mounted singing their Songs of Ascent facing the Double and Triple Gates through which second Temple pilgrims passed into the Temple Mount where more psalms and pageantry awaited them. We have to come back to the present street to ascend the Mount itself, and when inside, we stand facing the golden dome covering the even shatiach, the foundation stone of the world.

Inside the dome is a massive stone around which Jews, Christians and Muslims have woven their web of legends. For Jews it is the place where Abraham stood, knife in hand, ready to slaughter his son Isaac, and Jacob rested here on his way to Haran. For Christians, it is the place where the holy family rested in a cave underneath the stone. In that cave one is reminded of the legend that says when Mohammed rose into the heaven on his horse Barak, the stone attempted to follow. Stopped by divine command, it remains suspended between heaven and earth.

There is enough in the city that is not legend, but historical reality. One can see the stones lying where they fell onto the Herodian pavement when fires set by Romans enveloped the temple. The heat was so intense that the stones literally exploded out of the wall. You can almost hear the screams of the victims and shouts of the victors as the mountain burned.

Further into the upper city is a stark reminder of those awful last weeks of the city in the year 70. Under new buildings of the Jewish Quarter lie the ruins of the city: mansions, mikvahs, city squares where priests and commoners walked. Two stand out. One is the "burnt house." The upper stories are gone, but the bottom floor remains. Pottery and furniture stand where they were buried in the rubble. A spear leans against the wall. When the house was uncovered, the arm-bone of a young woman was found stretched out toward the spear. Nearby you can see a tunnel, perhaps one through which the defenders escaped from the inferno, the survivors reaching Masada where they held out for another three years.

Cross the square and enter another basement where several huge mansions once stood. The mosaic floors are intact, as are the mikvehs, large receiving halls, wall frescos and doorways. Here priestly families lived, only steps away from the temple. One exhibit stands out: a blackened wall, with thick layers of ash covering the floor, evidence of the fires which destroyed the quarter.

But outside is life, in all its variety. A group of haredi families rest while their children play under the shadow of a present-day ruin, the remains of the Hurvah synagogue destroyed by the Jordanians in 1948. A line of Christian pilgrims marches toward the plaza in front of the Western Wall. A youth group from North America heads for the pizza stalls above the Byzantine Cardo. Two baalei-tshuvah wearing their tallit katan (but no kippot) eat ice cream.

Two tours going simultaneously into the Herodian mansions deserve to stand as a symbol of the Jerusalem of the here and now: One guide explains in great detail the splendor of the original mansions, the strict observance of Mosaic law the mosaics showed (no figures, only geometric designs) and the luxury and wealth of the homes with their private baths, stone vessels and elegant frescos. His group clucks its collective teeth at the destruction. Hard on their heels comes a North American youth group. Look at the conspicuous wealth shown here, their guide laments, while the poor lived in crowded alleyways in the lower parts of the city.

Then both groups depart together for the Western Wall, just in time for Minchah.

Swiss reputation takes a beating

Switzerland's reputation for financial honesty, economic solidity and historical neutrality has been taking a beating in the last several months. After half a century, Switzerland's duplicitous roles in sealing its borders to Jews before and during the Holocaust, collaborating with Nazi big wigs such as Goering, and hiding massive sums of money and securities from Jewish depositors are surfacing in the media.

By Arnold Ages

Even the poets are participating in the painful reconstruction of Switzerland's checkered past. Haim Gouri, an Israeli novelist, journalist and filmmaker has a poem in a recent collection of his works (Wayne State) entitled Geneva 1947. In this four-stanza poem, Gouri compares the tranquillity, beauty and wilful ignorance of Swiss society to the horrendous deeds which were being perpetrated against Jews across its borders.

Writes Gouri: "My blood never flowed here. The Rhone bore no corpses. No soldiers beat babies on the cobblestones here." Then comes this poetically stinging rebuke: "You only held your peace, innocent dove. A few miles away black, hungry smoke coiled skyward. Forgive me. My bitter heart. You cannot know, lovely doe. You have not seen Geneva." Gouri may have to revise his poem now in light of the revelations of the last few months about the violence done by the Swiss to Jewish assets.

What is especially ironic about all the attention being paid to Switzerland these days is that Jews all over the world will be shortly commemorating and evaluating that other valuable Jewish asset that has been associated since 1897 with another Swiss city, Basel, for it was there that the first - ever Zionist Congress was held.

In the coming year, books, articles, proclamations, radio and television programs and special events in Israel and the Diaspora will focus on the extraordinary meeting that heralded the official birth of political Zionism. Yet the name Basel in Zionist history conveys much more than just the political apparatus and structure through which the Zionist enterprise was catapulted into the modern world; it conjures up a picture and civilizational change which thereafter affected Jews all over the world.

One of the things that has always puzzled this writer is why Switzerland and particularly Basel, a pleasant but backwater Swiss city, were chosen as the venue for the first congress. That question (and many others about early Zionist culture) has been answered for me by Michael Berkowitz.

Berkowitz notes in his Zionist Culture (University of North Carolina Press) that Herzl and the planners of the first meeting wanted a German city in order to accommodate the linguistic preferences of the vast majority of those who were going to attend. However, the delegates could not meet in Munich, their first choice, because opposition to Zionism had been voiced by that city's Jewish religious community, fearing that a Zionist enclave might somehow run counter to German nationalism.

A compromise was reached by selecting a Swiss city in the German-speaking part of the country. Herzl was in favor of Zurich, the great international centre of business, commerce and the arts. But the steering committee of the first congress was afraid that the city's reputation as a hot bed of radical agitation might not sit well with the conservative East European delegates from the interior of Russia.

It was a good choice...Basel provided the matrix not only for the political organization that took place among Zionist delegates, but also for the development of the broader range of Zionist cultural activities – Jewish education, Hebrew language instruction, literature, music and later, a Zionist flag. Berkowitz notes in his wonderfully enlightening essay that the famous Zionist anthem, Hatikvah, was not the first choice of Herzl, because the author of the lyrics, Naftali Herz Imber, had a rather bad reputation in Zionist circles. A competition was launched to select the Zionist anthem, but for sentimental reasons Hatikvah was retained.

One hundred years after the first Zionist Congress and with the painful news about Switzerland's sorry record during the testing years, the essential teachings of Zionism have been confirmed. Only a state under Jewish sovereignty can eradicate the powerlessness that doomed Jews in history.

A classic remembered

The other day, quite by accident, I came across a little book that stirred up long-buried memories. Published exactly 50 years ago in English, it remains a classic of solid argument combined with passion. I remember having read it when I came back from the army a half century ago, and how I was entranced by the style and the logic as much as by the subject. The author was Jean-Paul Sartre, Europe's leading exponent of existentialism, member of the French Resistance and of the post-war government installed by Charles de Gaulle.

By Rabbi Gunther Plaut

I re-read the 153 small pages in one quick sitting and I learned, once again, why the title, Anti-Semite and Jew, which had attracted me at the time, makes its continued claim on anyone who deals with this intractable subject.

Sidney Hook, a leading political and literary analyst of the time, characterized Sartre's little work as "one of the most brilliant psychological analyses of the marginal Jew and of the fanatical anti-Semite that has ever been published." I tend to agree.

You will find no statistics or any of the other material that you would expect in a wide-ranging study of the subject. What you will find, however, is a string of descriptions that tears every anti-Semitic argument to shreds.

The little treatise begins with the kind of irrational statements that anti-Semites are wont to make about Jews and, rather quickly, Sartre comes to this conclusion: "If the Jew did not exist, the anti-Semite would invent him."

Here are some other of his observations: "Anti-Semitism is a problem that affects us all directly; we are all bound to the Jew, because anti-Semitism leads straight to national socialism, and if we do not respect the person of the Institute, who will respect us? If we are conscious of these dangers, if we have lived in shame because of our involuntary complicity with the anti-Semites, who have made hangmen of us all, perhaps we shall begin to understand that we must fight for the Jew, no more or less than for ourselves."

Sartre was of course referring to the dismal record of the Vichy government and its accomplices; he felt shame for those of his fellow countrymen who were all too eager to do the bidding of the Nazis when it came to persecuting Jews.

Lastly, some of Sartre's concluding remarks: "We must say that anti-Semitism is not a Jewish problem, it is our problem Since we are not guilty and yet run the risk of being its victims, we must be very blind indeed not to see that it is our concern in the highest degree. It is not up to the Jews first of all to form a militant league against anti-Semitism; it is up to us...Not one Frenchman will be free so long as the Jews do not enjoy the fullness of their rights. Not one Frenchman will be secure so long as a single Jew – in France or in the world at large – can fear for his life."

The Kirshner File

The jewel in Diamond's crown

Abel Joseph (Jack) Diamond swept through his airy domain like a whirlwind, stopping here to turn on a light in the library and pausing there to ask an employee hunched over a computer what she was doing.

By Sheldon Kirshner

Diamond is a hands-on boss, a stickler for details. If he hadn't been, he might not be one of Canada's most distinguished architects.

Working out of a renovated downtown building, the site of Toronto's first knitting mill, Diamond has amassed a body of work that is the envy of his exacting and highly competitive profession.

The winner of four Governor General's awards and the recipient of numerous honors, Diamond has stamped his imprimatur on public and private structures in Canada, Israel, the United States, Europe and Asia.

From the University of Toronto's Earth Science Centre to Jerusalem's City Hall, Diamond's buildings have ensured him a place in the pantheon of great architects.

A consummate professional like Diamond is always busy, and now he and his partner, Donald Schmitt, are in the throes of supervising an eclectic array of new projects.

The jewel in the crown of their portfolio of assignments is Israel's $40-million, 225,000-square-foot Foreign Ministry building in Jerusalem, which Diamond describes as "the best thing I've ever done." Designed in conjunction with the Israeli firm of Kolker Kolker Epstein, it is scheduled to be completed in 1998, the 50th anniversary of Israel's founding. Diamond calls it "a building of state of national and international importance." It will replace a warren of hastily-built shacks that has been Israel's face to the world since the late 1940s.

In Jerusalem, Diamond is also presiding over the construction of the Gateway project, a mixed-use complex consisting of a 10,000-seat stadium, an inter-city bus terminal, hotels and retail space.

And most recently, Diamond, who has been influenced by Ottoman and Mameluk architecture, was invited to enter a competition for the renovation of Yad Vashem, the Holocaust memorial/museum on Mount Herzl in Jerusalem.

Closer to home, Diamond's company has won contracts for the new nursing home for Baycrest's Centre for Geriatric Care in Toronto, the School of Journalism at the University of British Columbia, a suite of offices for the Canadian Imperial Bank of Commerce in Toronto, the Jewish Community Centre in Manhattan, a vineyard in California's Napa Valley and a villa on a Caribbean island.

Apart from suburban subdivisions, of which he is not enamored, Diamond is theoretically open to all esthetically challenging commissions. "Almost any project can be turned into good architecture," said Diamond, an athletic-looking man casually clad in slacks, an open-neck jersey and loafers. "But we won't take on a project unless we can do it well."

Diamond, whose facility for blending the old with the new is one of his greatest strengths, explained that "user satisfaction" lies at the core of his philosophy. But Diamond, who learned from such masters as Frank Lloyd Wright and Louis Kahn, also insists on balancing internal and external forces and using natural light.

"The best of the Diamond and Schmitt buildings exhibit graceful proportions, a coherent resolution of design problems and a degree of originality," critic Robert Fulford has observed.

Diamond, who considers himself a secular Jew although his maternal grandfather was the chief rabbi of Finland and then London, likens architecture to Jewish thought.

"There is a creative tension between the spiritual and the material," he said, leaning back on his chair in a reflective pose. "You have to deal with the practical and the here and now and with the symbolic and more profoundly spiritual aspects. And if a project appeals to a higher purpose, then I have a real interest."

Born in a small town in South Africa, the son of a Lithuanian entrepreneur who made and lost a fortune in ostrich farming before the age of 30, Diamond was instinctively drawn to architecture. As he put it, "I never decided to become an architect. I felt I was one in childhood."

At the tender age of four, Diamond was already drawing floor plans (he still has these drawings) and dreaming of being a famous architect.

At the University of Capetown, where he was a rugby star, he studied architecture. But before he graduated with a bachelor degree in that field, Diamond, who categorizes himself as a left-liberal, participated in the anti-apartheid movement and got to know such activists as Ruth First and Albie Sachs.

Offered a safe seat in parliament by the moderate United party, Diamond prepared himself for that task by immersing himself in the study of politics, economics and philosophy at Oxford University (where he met his wife, a mathematician who bore him two children, Andrew, a lawyer, and Suki, an architectual conservationist.)

But when he returned to South Africa from Britain, Diamond grew wary of the prospect of entering politics. "I didn't want to be caught between the extremes of whites and blacks," he explained.

Rejecting the advice and admonitions of his family, Diamond decided to leave South Africa after the 1961 Sharpeville massacre. "You either fought apartheid or you emigrated. My wife and I didn't want to raise children in a fascist country."

Returning to the discipline he loved, Diamond went to the United States to continue his education in architecture at the University of Pennsylvania. In 1964, the University of Toronto beckoned with an invitation to establish a graduate program in architecture. He accepted.

While teaching, Diamond practised his craft, winning commissions to design York Square (which set a standard for renovation) and the headquarters of the Ontario Medical Association.

Since then, he has not looked back, making his mark on the architecture of housing, municiple government centres, university campuses and educational institutions.

And Diamond, whose pencil sketches and watercolors were exhibited at the Italian Cultural Institute in Toronto last spring, has been a visiting professor at Harvard, Princeton and the University of California (Berkeley). Recently, he took up an offer from the University of Pennsylvania, his alma mater, to deliver a series of lectures.

Diamond, an Officer of the Order of Canada since 1996 and an aficionado of chamber and choral music, has been back to South Africa many times to visit family and friends. And like virtually all South African expatriates, he is amazed that apartheid died within his lifetime.

"It's an absolute miracle," said Diamond, who was a member of the Ontario Human Rights Commission from 1986 to 1989. Whites, he said, should be "eternally grateful for the tolerance and forgiveness" blacks have exhibited since the advent of a multiracial democracy in South Africa.

Hugs and kisses

By RABBI REUVEN TRADBURKS

I wish I knew what you are thinking. Is what you are saying really what you are thinking? Jacob wondered the same thing when he encountered Esau: Is the hug and the kiss real or is it fake? The Torah hints at the answer by placing dots over the words "he kissed him," suggesting that hugs and kisses can be real or they can be fake.

In a number of places in the Torah, words are written with dots over them. I had a music teacher who used to draw a pair of glasses over the places that needed extra attention – "Open your eyes when you get here and pay more attention," he would be saying. The Torah says the same things by placing dots over the words – "Open your eyes when you get here. There is more than meets the eye."

The Torah describes how after Jacob tricked Isaac into giving him the blessing instead of giving it to Esau, Esau wanted to kill Jacob. Jacob fled for his life.

After many years, HaShem says to Jacob: Go back to the Land and I will protect you. Jacob journeys back to meet Esau, wondering whether Esau will put the past behind them and be amicable. Can a brother who once wanted to kill him, now live peacefully with him? When the big moment arrives, Esau runs to greet Jacob, hugs him, falls on his shoulder, kisses him and they cry.

So what is the answer? Does Esau still hate Jacob or is it all in the past? Does he still harbor violent thoughts? Is he merely overcome by the moment, but deep down his real feelings are of hatred? Do we accept a kiss at face value – what you see on the outside is what is on the inside, the kiss on the outside is a sign of love on the inside?

The Torah places dots on each letter of the words "he kissed him." Look deeper; there is more than meets the eye. One opinion in the midrash is that the more than meets the eye is an underlying hatred – he is kissing on the outside, hating on the inside. The other opinion is that he was sincerely overcome with emotion and at that moment felt genuine brotherly feelings toward Jacob.

Life isn't simple – we often do not know what goes on inside the minds of our children when they go through those dreaded rebellions. Is this a genuine rebellion or an innocuous assertion of independence? The debate in the midrash seems to indicate to us that even in the mind of the person involved, there is ambivalence – Esau loved and hated at the same time. He himself didn't know what to think.

If we could see into the minds of others, life would be so much simpler. In the meantime, we live peering, but never really knowing what lies deep inside others.

In a telephone interview with Linda Frum about this memoir of her mother, I asked, "What prompted you to write the book?"

Her answer was quick and forthright: "To provide an honest and accurate record for my children and for my mother's many friends and admirers."

Barbara Frum was Canada's most popular media personality. As a tough, but fair-minded interviewer for CBC Radio's As It Happened and CBC TV's The Journal, she conducted over 2,500 interviews, many with luminaries as disparate as Jimmy Carter, Nelson Mandela, Pierre Trudeau and Hosni Mubarak.

Was she a good mother? There were inevitable difficulties, her daughter acknowledges, as Barbara tried to juggle the conflicting demands of career and family. Yet she conscientiously fulfilled her responsibilities as a busy working woman as well as wife and mother. In addition, she had many friends, was an active citizen, a dedicated art collector, a serious gardener and a generous philanthropist.

There appears to be some confusion in many minds: Was Barbara conservative or liberal in her political and social outlook?

Confronted with these questions, Barbara reacted vehemently. "When people call me right wing, I think it's hilarious. I suppose they think that [way] because my son David is right wing, which has made people question 20 years of my work. But we disagree about almost everything. If I thought people were serious in calling me right wing, I would be hurt; I regard myself as a '50s small-l liberal. But people shouldn't know that from watching The Journal."

Linda indicates that her mother always urged her children to hold strong opinions, to defend deeply held convictions and to become articulate and responsible citizens.

What were Barbara's attitudes towards Judaism? Linda describes her mother's outlook as emotional rather than spiritual. She was an unbeliever, but took great pride in her Jewish identity. She was a member of a synagogue, savored Jewish food and responded to the tug of Jewish history.

Linda remembers Passover at home. "My mother prepared lavishly for the Seder. I think of her on the porch one year, shredding potent horseradish by hand, her nose running and eyes tearing as she drolly declared, 'Nothing too good for my kinder!' "

A loving tribute

For 18 years Barbara suffered from a fatal disease. How to live and work with leukemia that could strike at any time was a tragic burden and a terrible secret. What sustained her? Linda feels that it was her busy and rich life, her love of gardening, her concern for family, her interest in collecting art. Illness was shunted aside.

Linda's description of the progressive nature of her mother's physical decline is poignant and touching. "Several times in the months preceding her death, as she grew weaker and weaker, she had warned me that if her disease progressed beyond the point where she could maintain her dignity and independence, she would kill herself." Linda was appalled. Barbara insisted, "I will never allow my life to be a burden to you."

This book is a loving and eloquent tribute by a grieving, yet grateful, daughter for a life that enhanced her own.

David Frum described his grief this way: "It's like standing on the back of a train, and you watch Mum get off. And then the train pulls away taking you farther and farther away from her." A host of Canadians will understand how he felt.

Family discovers its tree may have 12,000 branches ton, N.B. to Kitchener, Ont., in 1982, she met up with her cousins, the Budds, whose grandparents had left St. John, N.B. for Kitchener early in the century. The question was, how were the two families related?

About 18 months ago, Walman and her cousin Esther Budd made a concerted effort to find the answer. Questioning uncles, aunts and other relatives, they ascertained that their respective great-grandfathers had been brothers from the neighboring towns of Lachowicze and Baranowicze, near Slonim, Poland.

As a bonus, a Fredericton cousin provided the names of their great-great-grandparents: Shmuel Bud-owla and his wife Chaya Zlata, née Charlap. As it happened, not only did this add another generation to the tree, it connected the family to a distinguished rabbinical line reaching back into antiquity. Arthur Menton, an American genealogist, had visited Fredericton the summer before to collect details of the Charlap connection.

In remarkably short order, Walman and Budd had charted a family tree containing about 600 names. Last month, more than 100 relatives arrived in Kitchener from as far away as Fredericton, New Jersey and Houston to attend a family reunion. Menton, who came from Long Island, used the occasion to unveil The Book of Destiny: Toledot Charlap, his newly published 700-page magnum opus on the Charlap family, of which the Canadian Budd and Budovitch families compose but a small branch.

Menton, a 63-year-old engineer and management consultant, lives in the former whaling village of Cold Spring Harbor, L.I. Over the past decade, he has travelled the world seeking Charlaps with intensity and single-mindedness.

In discovering Arthur Menton, Walman and Budd found an instant link to a family tree bearing some 12,000 names, including relatives living in Israel, Australia, New Zealand and most countries in eastern and central Europe, Britain and the Americas. As Menton explained, their shared lineage crosses the formidable Ashkenazi-Sephardi divide, contains historical figures from medieval Spain and Constantinople, and reaches into ancient times with a claimed descent from King David.

It took Menton some years to follow his river to the sea. At first, all he knew was that his grandfather, Max Ser, had arrived in New York in 1891 from Ciechenowiec, a town midway between Warsaw and Bialystok. From this, he traced the Ser line back to an ancestor, Zebulon Ser, an innkeeper who had changed the name from Charlap about 1805. (Menton cannot explain why he chose the name Ser, which means "cheese" in Polish.)

Charlap is an acronym of the Hebrew phrase, chacham rosh l'golei Polin, which translates as "the chief sage of the exiles in Poland." The first rabbi to bear this title was Eliezer Don Yahya, the scion of a prominent Sephardi family who arrived in Tykocin, Poland, from Constantinople about 1600. Zebulon Ser's father, born about 1740, was Rabbi Abraham Charlap, a documented descendant of Eliezer Don Yahya.

Menton possesses fragments of letters that his relatives wrote in the 11th and 12th centuries, and can even explain how the family reached the Iberian peninsula. "One of my ancient relatives was hung by the emperor of Persia in Pumbedita, and his son fled to Spain..."

Independent claims of the descent from King David arose repeatedly during his many interviews with farflung relatives. "These people would pull out ancient scrolls and unravel them for me, to show me how they arrived at this," he said. "They lived all over the place: one family in Tblisi, Georgia, another in Tykocin, Poland... They knew nothing of each other."

Many scholarly articles written on the alleged descent from King David "have concluded that this was one of the few families that could prove that it was so," said Menton, who publishes his own quarterly, B'rayshit:, The Ser-Charlap Family Newsletter. Related family names include Cear, Danowittz, Donchin, Ibn Yahya, Kiejsmacher, Kopyto, Kuhr, Kur, Kuropatwa, Lapin, Levine, Lew, Lewin, Mankuta, Packciarz, Parczewski, Pasternak, Podkowa, Rosansky, Sahr, Sharlip, Sier, Sir, Smolarcyk and Tama.

"It came as a total surprise to me that our family was originally Sephardi. But after doing my research, I've learned that such distinctions don't really matter. What my research has given me is the profound understanding that all Jews around the world are part of one united family."

Has some aspect of your family tree research got you stumped? Write to The CJN, Roots & Remembrance, 1500 Don Mills Rd., Suite 205, North York M3B 3K4, and your query may be answered in a future column. Sorry, no personal replies will be made.

Bulgarian leaders helped save local Jewish population

BY BILL GLADSTONE
Special to the CJN

TORONTO – Bulgarian parliamentarian Dimiter Peshev, along with King Boris, church and union leaders, MPs and many others, mounted a campaign that foiled Nazi attempts to deport the country's 50,000 Jews to labor and death camps in Poland, a leading Israeli historian told a Toronto audience at Beth Sholom synagogue recently as part of Holocaust Education Week.

HOLOCAUST EDUCATION WEEK

According to Prof. Michael Bar Zohar, the resistance movement could not prevent an additional 11,500 Jews in territories then annexed to Bulgaria from being shipped to Treblinka, where all but three perished.

Although Peshev was leader of the pro-fascist majority in Parliament in a country allied to Germany, he fiercely opposed the deportation of the Jews. Despite anti-Jewish laws enacted after the outbreak of the war, Bulgaria's Jewish community was well-assimilated into the Bulgarian majority and had lived in harmony with them under Turkish rule for 500 years.

When Alexander Benev, a top-ranking government minister, signed an agreement in March 1943 allowing the deportation of the 11,500 Jews plus another 8,500 from Bulgaria proper, Peshev sprung into action to organize a strong opposition. At first, Benev vehemently denied the deportation plans even as his secretary-lover clandestinely confirmed them. "She couldn't keep the secret to herself and she told her Jewish friends, risking everything by doing so," Bar Zohar said.

King Boris was "a modest, quiet man, very popular, a man of the people," who walked a cautious line between his German allies and the Russians. As Bar Zohar recounted, when Peshev presented his opposition, King Boris cancelled the deportation order, saying: "Not one Bulgarian Jew leaves Bulgaria."

"The ambassador from Germany was livid," said Bar Zohar. "He sent a telegram to Berlin, saying, 'These people don't know what fascism is all about.'"

In Parliament, where Peshev had convinced 43 MPs to sign a petition against the deportations, the prime minister forced him to resign, causing an uproar. Meanwhile, King Boris was summoned to Berchtesgaden to meet with Hitler and his foreign affairs minister, Joachim Von Ribbentrop. "Von Ribbentrop yelled at King Boris, saying, 'There is only one solution to the Jewish problem, that is the Final Solution!'

"King Boris said, 'You're right, but I can't give you my Jews because they're needed for road construction.' Now, I have never seen a road made by Jews in Bulgaria, but there were plenty of work camps," Bar Zohar said, asserting that not one Jew ever died in these camps from mistreatment.

A second agreement with the Nazis authorized the deportation of the country's Jews to Poland in two shipments of 25,000 from Sofia and 25,000 from the smaller cities. Sofia's Jews received notices in May 1943, warning them to be ready to leave within 72 hours. Protests from Peshev and others, however, resulted in a last-minute change in which Sofia's Jews were deported to the country's smaller cities. "Not one was deported out of Bulgaria," Bar Zohar said.

King Boris was again summoned to see Hitler, this time in East Prussia, where "they had a quarrel over whether the Bulgarian army would participate in the fighting against the Russians. The King said that the Bulgarian people regarded the Russians as liberators and wouldn't fight them, and Hitler was in a rage."

Ten days later, back in Bulgaria, King Boris was discovered dead. "The official version in Bulgaria is that King Boris was poisoned by Hitler. It's a big mystery, like the JFK assassination. We haven't found any conclusive evidence, although we've found that two Germans were sent to see the King, who was sick in bed at the time."

Bulgaria's Jewish community was the only one in Europe that grew in number during the war years, Bar Zohar said. Despite warm feelings for the land of their birth, about 95 per cent of the Jews emigrated to Israel after 1948.

The train that took him out of Bulgaria stopped at the Yugoslav border, he recounted, and all 5,000 Jews on board disembarked, looked back at their homeland, and sang the Bulgarian anthem..

Documentary explores kindertransport program

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to the CJN

TORONTO – When Melissa Hacker decided to make a documentary film about the kindertransport program that took some 10,000 Jewish children, including her mother, out of Germany, Austria and Czechoslovakia just before World War II, she knew exactly where to look for rare film footage – and donated funds – to complete her project.

Other rare newsreel footage shows the arrival of the first 200 children in Britain, which had amended its immigration policy to admit them, and the Bishop of Canterbury making a sombre plea to British citizens to take them into their homes. The young people were between five and 17 years of age; most, despite their fervent hopes, would never see their parents again.

Hacker's 80-minute documentary, My Knees Were Jumping: Remembering the Kindertransports, took seven years and more than $100,000 to complete. After a screening recently in Toronto as part of Holocaust Education Week, Hacker explained that her mother, a leading cinematic costume designer, had given her an entree to Barbra Streisand, Dustin Hoffman and other actors who had foundations that assisted financially with the film, which she completed between freelance editing assignments as a labor of love.

Hacker's mother, who also worked on Taxi Driver, Annie Hall, Tootsie and Prince of Tides, is featured prominently in the film, which is as much an exploration of the mother-daughter relationship as it is about the kindertransports. Besides documenting the historical reality, the film delves into the lingering psychological impact of the kindertransport experience on succeeding generations, and records the first reunion of kindertransport children (now adults) that took place several years ago in Israel.

While the reaction to the film was overwhelmingly positive, one man pointed out that it gives the misleading impression that the kindertransports went only to Britain, whereas Holland and Belgium also received kindertransport shipments.

My Knees Were Jumping: Remembering the Kindertransports received its worldwide premiere at the San Francisco Jewish Film Festival in 1995.

'Mixed message' in encyclical

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO – A long-suppressed 1938 papal encyclical is "not a ringing denunciation of anti-Jewish actions," and there is real doubt that it would have averted the Holocaust.

The surfacing of the encyclical last year in a book published in Paris is important, but Prof. Michael Marrus told a Holocaust Education Week meeting that he does not agree with a published assertion that it would have changed history.

The encyclical was written by an American Jesuit John Lafarge at the request of Pope Pius XII, who died in February, 1939, but it was never made public.

There is a "mixed message" in the encyclical, which he has read in its French version, Marrus told an overflow crowd of 300 at Holy Blossom Temple.

Though it says anti-Semitism is not the way to deal with the Jewish question, the encyclical proposes a "quarantine" for Jews and repeats the long-standing Catholic condemnation of the refusal of Jews to abandon Judaism and accept Jesus as the messiah, Marrus said.

The encyclical, to be available in English in a year, says the Jewish question is one of religion, not race.

"We can only speculate on why it (the encyclical) was never issued. It is clear that Pope Pius XII was a different man and that may be the reason."

דליה רביקוביץ-כל השירים עד כה

זהו שמו של ספר שמאחד את כל השירים שכתבה עד כה דליה רביקוביץ, הבכירה במשוררות ישראל מאז שנפטרה לאה גולדברג למני דור. יש לה,לאשה היפה והעדינה הזו, קליטה של סרט פילם סופר רגיש עם חוש הומור קטן, כמעט לא ישראלי. בראיון שהתקיים איתה עם צאת הספר היא פירטה את השפלת היום-יום, את סף העוני והדלות שהיא נאלצת להרגיש על בשרה כל יום. ההתנסות היומיומית הקשה שלה עם החוויה הישראלית, עם הצפיפות,הכוחניות, האגרסיביות הולידה את השיר "שני איים מניו זילנד" שבחרתי להביא לכם קטע ממנו:

"כבר אין עוד טעם להסתיר
אנחנו נסיון שלא עלה יפה,
תוכנית שנשתבשה,
פרוקה ברצחנות רבה מידי,
מה לי מאלה ומה לי מאלה,
צורחים עד לגרון ניחר
ומפצלים חודה של שערה.
מכל מקום רצחנות רבה מידי
לאפריקה לא אסע
ולא לאסיה
ולא אסע בכלל.

בניו זילנד
על נאות דשא ומים
אנשים טובי לב
יפרסו לי מלחמם".

הכמיהה לניו זילנד, שהיא קרוב לודאי הדבר הכי מנוגד שאפשרי בעולם לחוויה הישראלית הרעשנית והאינטנסיבית, היא באיזשהו מקום סמל לכמיהתו של כל ישראלי לקצת שקט. ואולי זה מה שהביא רבים מאיתנו לכאן!

חורשת האקליפטוס:

מה אומר לכם האקליפטוס! כמובן, אותם עצים גדולים מאוסטרליה שיובשו ביצות בארץ ישראל. ועד היום אקליפטוס בארץ אומר שאתה נמצא ליד בסיס צבאי. אז מה פתאום באמצע הסתיו הקנדי צץ לו האקליפטוס! אז ככה: בקיץ הושאלו לגן החיות של טורונטו דובי קואלה שגרמו לכולם חמדה והתפעלות עמוקות. עכשיו צריך להחזיר אותם לסאן דיאגו לא בגלל שקר כאן בחורף, שהרי אפשר לחמם להם את הכלוב, אלא בגלל שהם אוכלים עלי אקליפטוס טריים. כל הקיץ הביאו להם מטוסי "איר קנדה" עלי אקליפטוס טריים מדרום קליפורניה. אבל עכשיו, כשעשו חשבון כספי, הסתבר שעולה להאכיל את הדובים הקטנים האלה יותר מאשר להשביע פיל. להתראות דובים! להתראות עלי אקליפטוס! נעבור חורף קר בלעדיכם.

From Chernobyl to summer respite in Toronto

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Eight-year old Elena Drougatchenko can thank insomnia and a late night television broadcast for a six-week respite away from life in the shadow of the Chernobyl nuclear reactor.

Drougatchenko recently spent much of the summer visiting with a Toronto-area family, enjoying the sights, eating real meals, playing like a kid and improving her sad state of health.

She returned to her home stronger and with her spirits lifted thanks to the volunteer effort of Carla Silver and her family.

It was Silver who, more than a year ago, found herself feeling fidgety and unable to sleep at 3 a.m. That's when she decided to do something useful, so while folding laundry she turned on a TV set and watched a CBC Witness documentary on how children downwind of Chernobyl were affected by the reactor's nuclear fallout.

"It was quite interesting and it stayed with me for a few days," particularly the scene that showed how children suffering from thyroid cancer didn't have medication or painkillers, she said.

Silver decided to do something about it so, after consulting with the Canadian Relief Fund for Chernobyl Victims of Belarus, she recruited three large corporations to ship needed drugs. After raising funds at St. Clements School, where she's a teacher, Novopharm matched the amount and provided drugs at cost while Apotex sent 4,800 sample drugs including painkillers, antibiotics and a cancer-treatment drug. Astra also provided medication.

Altogether, about 700 to 800 pounds of medication was shipped to a hospital in Chaussy, Belarus.

Elena Drougatchenko (right) with Beth Silver.

From that first, satisfying experience Silver decided to do more. With her husband Robin's agreement she decided to sponsor a child for six weeks, one that would be close in age to her own daughter, Beth.

Elena was chosen, one of 400 children who spent part of the summer in communities across Canada. After the Silvers paid their share of her airfare (about $550), health insurance ($150), visa and administrative costs, Elena was theirs for six weeks.

Although she doesn't suffer from cancer, when she arrived "she looked sick," Silver said. "She was very thin and very pale and she tired much more quickly than my children."

Almost nine, she weighed only 45 lbs., about 15 lbs. less than normal for Canadian children her age.

Because of radiation contamination, much of the land in Belarus can't be used to grow food and malnutrition results.

During her stay in Toronto, the Silvers made sure that Elena ate well. "She went nuts over plums and bananas. She didn't know what a plum was. She liked meat and potatoes and hot veggies. Surprisingly, she wasn't keen on McDonald's," Silver said.

In addition to her nutritional woes, she suffered from terrible dental problems with teeth so badly abscessed, they had eaten through to the bone.

Thanks to volunteer efforts of her friend, Frances Telch, a children's dentist, her teeth were repaired (or pulled) and she was given antibiotics. The family's doctor, Gary Mann, treated Elena pro bono as well.

When she wasn't being examined by doctors and dentists, Elena was a regular kid, accompanying Beth to gymnastics and swimming classes.

On one memorable afternoon, Elena joined 300 other Chernobyl kids for a day of fun at Canada's Wonderland.

When she left for home, Elena had gained five pounds and "she had more color, was prettier and healthier," Silver said.

"She learned a lot of English but she was a quiet, introspective girl who was reluctant to try it out."

Silver, who occasionally serves as a chazzan at Temple Emmanuel, said her sense of adventure was her prime motivation in participating in the sponsorship program.

"I'm always in search of an adventure but because I have a two and a 5-year-old, it's not that easy. It's not easy to travel so I bring my adventure to me. It was fun."

The family plans to call Elena around New Year's to see if she'd like to come back. "If she doesn't want to come, perhaps her brother will."

CHRC tribunal to examine Zundel Website

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The Canadian Human Rights Commission (CHRC) has asked a tribunal to determine whether Nazi apologist Ernst Zundel has posted hate material on the Internet.

The move could set a precedent in determining whether the rights body has jurisdiction to prevent the promotion of hatred on international computer networks. Zundel's computer Web site is reportedly based in California, though computers in Canada can easily get access to the material.

Michelle Falardeau-Ramsay, the CHRC's deputy chief commissioner, said a precedent exists for the rights body to prevent hate messages entering Canada from the United States. The Heritage Front was ordered to cease telephone hate messages and was found in contempt when it provided hate messages from a U.S.-based message machine, she said.

The CHRC referred the Zundel case to a tribunal after investigating two complaints about his computer site. The complaints, which date back to July and September, originated with the Toronto Mayor's Committee on Race Relations and from Sabina Citron.

Citron, a Holocaust survivor, was responsible for laying criminal charges in 1983 against Zundel under the defunct "false news" section of the Criminal Code. Although Zundel was convicted under that section, the Supreme Court ruled it unconstitutional.

The tribunal will investigate the allegation that Zundel promoted hatred or contempt of Jews by alleging the Holocaust never happened or by minimizing its scope.

The move is sure to stir controversy over free speech issues but Bernie Farber, director of community relations for Canadian Jewish Congress, believes the Internet is not sacrosanct.

"We believe that Canadian law applies to the Internet," he said, adding the case will establish "whether or not the CHRC has the jurisdiction to deal with hate on the Internet."

New shlichah talks tachlis

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter

Miri Gur

TORONTO – If prospective olim have no second thoughts about leaving Canada to move to Israel, Miri Gur will do her best to ensure they have considered every angle.

The recently appointed regional director of Toronto's Israel Aliyah Center – which serves all of Ontario, Winnipeg, Alberta, Rochester and Buffalo – sees herself as an adviser. "You have to be realistic. It's my job to tell them what reality is, to ask 'What are you going to do there? Where do you plan to live? How will you pay your rent?' These are things that people sometimes don't think about."

The Israeli-born Gur has been doing just that for the past year as an assistant shlichah (emissary) in the Aliyah Center. Her predecessor, Udi Savion, returned to Israel in October after almost three years as aliyah shaliach.

A high school teacher by training with a Master's degree in counselling from the American University in Washington, D.C., Gur worked with new olim in Israel from 1990 to 1995. She spent two years as director of ulpans in Petach Tikvah and three as supervisor and inspector of some 250 ulpans in Israel's central region including Tel Aviv.

In the latter position, she established workplace ulpans, in an innovative project she refers to as her "baby."

Gur's husband, Baruch, now a special emissary for United Jewish Appeal, began working with Soviet Jews in the 1960s. "I've been married 27 years; I was always in this atmosphere of Jews that came to Israel," says Miri.

For prospective olim who seek the new shlichah's advice, Gur recommends a pilot trip. Her office, with the help of an affiliated "job developer" in Israel, can assist in arranging job interviews.

"Everything starts and finishes with a job," she says. "If you have a job, you have a normal life."

Even so, she is particularly careful about assessing the needs of people who want to make aliyah because of job prospects in Israel. "Maybe it will be better in Israel, however, when people are going as immigrants they have to consider the whole picture. Life in Israel is different from here. We have security problems. You have to really want to go and live in another country with everything that comes with it."

"It's important for the Jewish community to know what real life is in Israel. I would think it makes them even more Jewish. Even if you're not religious in Israel, you are very Jewish in your being. You live a Jewish life."

Kirshblum celebrates 30 years as shul's cantor

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO – In his 30-year career at Adath Israel Congregation, Cantor Eli Kirshblum has overseen hundreds of singers – children, teens and adults – who made up his choirs. Of those alumni, six have followed in Kirshblum's footsteps and are serving as cantors at other congregations in North America.

Cantor Kirshblum

This weekend, the 59-year-old cantor will be honored at Adath Israel on Shabbat morning, when Cantor David Bagley will be guest cantor, and on Sunday night, when the Toronto Council of Hazzanim will present a gala cantorial concert.

Featured guest cantors at the concert will include Tibor Kelen of New York City, Ben Zion Miller of New York City, Yaacov Motzen of Montreal and Israel Rand of Ramat Gan, Israel. Local cantors David Bagley, Louis Danto, Paul Kowarsky, Yehudah Rottner, Efraim Sapir and Benjamin Maissner will also appear.

A former president of the Toronto Council of Hazzanim, which includes Orthodox, Conservative and Reform cantors, lyric tenor Kirshblum is equally at home in the world of Jewish education. With a master's degree in education, and cantorial training by the late Cantor David Koussevitsky, he could have pursued a career in either field and had already begun PhD studies in education when he was offered the position at Adath Israel.

He left his graduate studies behind to move here from his native New York, but reconnected formally to the world of Jewish education in 1975, when he became educational director of Adath Israel's congregational school.

Kirshblum laments the decline of traditional chazzanut in North America, but says "the problem lies "as much with us as professionals as with the community in general."

He believes there has to be opportunity for congregant participation in a service and is a strong proponent of choirs, which are "almost entirely passe" in the United States, to his displeasure.

Kirshblum's professional choir sings every Shabbat from September to June. The choir is enlarged by three volunteer choirs – teen, adult and children's – five times a year.

Kirshblum includes female soloists in his choirs, but sees female cantors as violating halachah. He was one of at least 10 Conservative cantors in Ontario who broke away from the movement's Cantor's Assembly following their 1991 decision to admit women.

"A chazzan is a shaliach tzibur [emissary of the congregation]," says Kirshblum. "There are specific parts of the liturgy which by tradition a woman cannot lead. The parts she is given as a solo [in the choir] do not violate the law."

Choirs, he says, brings participants closer to the synagogue. "From these groups come future rabbis and cantors."

Cantor Gary Zener of Calgary's Beth Tzedec Congregation, an alumnus of Kirshblum's choir, credits Kirshblum for inspiring his own career. "He is a chazzan's chazzan," wrote Zener in a recent letter.

BOYS TOWN HONORS LESLIE DAN

Boys Town Jerusalem last week paid tribute to Toronto philanthropist Leslie Dan by awarding him the Jan Zwartendijk Humanitarian Ethics and Values Award. From left, Dr. Michael Berenbaum, director of research at the United States Holocaust Memorial; Michael J. Scharf, national president, Boys Town Jerusalem Foundation; Leslie Dan; and Rabbi Ronald Gray, executive vice-president, Boys Town Jerusalem Foundation. The award is named for the little-known Dutch honorary consul in Kovno, Poland, who issued exit visas to Curacao to 2,200 Jews, many of them Torah scholars, during the Holocaust. There is now an effort underway to have Zwartendijk officially recognized as a Righteous Gentile. Founded in 1949, Boys Town Jerusalem provides academic, religious and technical education to over 1,000 students from troubled and impoverished backgrounds. [Randy Zelcer photo]

How safe is blood supply?

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Special to the CJN

TORONTO – Canada's blood supply is as safe as it possibly can be, says the head of infectious diseases at Toronto Hospital, General Division.

"Contracting the HIV virus from a blood transfusion is getting a lot more publicity than it deserves. With testing, there is now a one in 250,000 chance of being infected," says Irving Salit.

Salit will form part of a public forum to be held on Dec. 3, 7:30 p.m. at Beth Tzedec Congregation. Entitled How Safe is Our Blood?, the program is co-sponsored by the AIDS committees of Holy Blossom Temple, Beth David Synagogue and Beth Tzedec.

Forum members will include Beth Tzedec's Rabbi Baruch Frydman-Kohl; Dr. Roslyn Herst, a medical officer of the Canadian Red Cross, Toronto Centre; Dr. Alan Powell, founder, Hepatitis C Survivors Society; John Plater, Toronto and Central Ontario Region Hemophilia Society; R. Douglas Elliott, lead counsel for the Canadian AIDS Society; and Lynn Kampf, who tests HIV-positive. Moderator will be Dr. Brian Goldman of CBC's The Health Show.

Salit says there are about a dozen fairly common things that can potentially be transmitted through blood transfusions, including regular bacteria, malaria and syphilis. But most people are concerned about the transmission of viruses like hepatitis or HIV.

"Nothing is 100 percent safe – there is always something that can slip through. The risk, however, is very low," he says.

When faced with a possible blood transfusion, says Salit, one must balance one risk against another.

Instilling pride for 25 years

By LEILA SPEISMAN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO – There is no reason why people who are mentally handicapped should not enjoy many of the same things that everyone else does, asserts Suzanne Agasee.

This is not just an idealistic sentiment for Agasee. Since its founding 25 years ago, she has been associated with the Kadima Centre, a social, recreational and educational centre for mentally handicapped people 18 years of age and up, which meets at Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue.

"We just lost our oldest member," Agasee told The CJN in an interview in her Downsview home. "He was 80."

Participants can come for the Tuesday Supper Club, which meets every Tuesday from 4:30 to 6:30. For a nominal $6.00, they get a nutritious meal and a program. On Sundays from 2 to 4, there are different events, such as movies ("They really loved The Bear," Agasee said), bowling or other sports.

There is a glee club and special programming for holidays – a mothers' day dance, a model seder, Purim and Chanukah parties, and a fathers' day barbecue.

As well, the group goes on special trips to places such as Canada's Wonderland, the Science Centre, the Zoo and baseball games.

"We are so grateful for the volunteers who help us, especially the Leonard Mayzell Lodge of B'nai Brith, and the Sons of Jacob, Shalom Lodge."

When Agasee decided to return to the workforce after her children were born, she began to work with the Metropolitan Toronto Association for the Mentally Retarded (now called the Metropolitan Toronto Association for Community Living) in nursery schools.

Twenty-five years ago, when Rabbi Joseph Kelman of Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Congregation and a group of parents agitated for somenlace for their handicapped /erything we do instils pride and confidence," she said.

For instance, after seeing a performance by the Famous People Players, they sold buttons to help them raise funds. "They felt they were contributing to the community – not just taking from it."

When asked how she got involved with Kadima, the atmosphere changed, as she told about her own life. "I was born in France,"

Suzanne Agasee (in hat and sunglasses) rests with a group of Kadima members at Canada's Wonderland.

she said, then added almost, but not quite, matter-of-factly, "When I was two, [the Nazis] took my parents away, first to Drancy, then to Auschwitz. I never saw them again."

She and her brothers were taken by the underground and hidden with a Catholic family during the war. Later, they were sent to an orphanage, until they were brought to Canada, as part of the contingent of over 1,000 orphans rescued by Canadian Jewish Congress.

ProMontreal makes a difference for Quebec's young Jews

By DAVID LAZARUS
CJN Staff Reporter

MONTREAL – The referendum and all the events that have followed, from matzhahgate to the recent Roux affair, have made ProMontreal's task as tough as it's ever been.

ProMontreal was launched by FEDERATION CJA in the spring of 1992, with one main agenda: to give Montreal's young adults an incentive to work and thrive in a Jewish community unique in the world.

Leaders of ProMontreal, such as co-chair Robert Zittrer and founder Susan Levine, point to its successes that have earned its attention and inspired similar initiatives worldwide, including its much-imitated and award-winning In Montreal magazine, the Contact ProMontreal career-find program for recent graduates, and a range of other social and community-related activities.

Yet they also acknowledge that Quebec's unprecedented level of political uncertainty, the perception of the Parti Québécois government as increasingly hostile towards ethnic groups, and the incidents involving the Jewish community in particular, have not made their job any easier.

For all its success, it's also no secret that the community is facing a stepped-up outflow of its most mobile segment – its young.

Zittrer and other Pro-Montreal leaders are sometimes even confronted by parents who say the group is doing younger Jews a disservice by encouraging them to stay in a place where they, at least in these parents' view, have no future.

> 'There is a quality of life here you can't duplicate'

For Zittrer and Levine, interviewed recently by The CJN, this is a completely false depiction of what ProMontreal has been about.

While ProMontreal has been about giving younger Jews reasons to stay in Quebec and live committed Jewish and Jewish community lives, they said, it has never been about leading people on or giving a false picture of the Quebec reality.

"We are not propagandists," Zittrer said. "If people decide to leave, we want them to know what they're leaving, what they're giving up, based on the facts.

"People have been under a lot of stress and strain, but the reality is that whatever the problems, there is a quality of life here that you can't duplicate. We are here for people who choose to stay."

If anything, Levine and Zittrer said, ProMontreal's record points to high levels of youth involvement in the Jewish community, in all capacities, and the community malaise has only served to convince FEDERATION CJA and ProMontreal to redouble its efforts.

It is expected, for example, that ProMontreal will become a permanent part of the federation's structure (and budget), instead of being classified as a special program. With a predicted annual budget of at least $300,000 it will also be an obvious priority.

Levine and Zittrer also pointed to several facts that they feel give a more balanced, and accurate, picture of the situation here, despite the recognized problems:

- The level of enrolment in Jewish day schools is up, meaning that younger Jewish families, including a new generation of immigrants, are indeed planting roots here.
- Student Federation, a pilot project of ProMontreal launched in the fall of 1992 and aimed at 18 to 25-year-olds, has mushroomed to over 3,300 members and is involved in all aspects of community life.
- ProMontreal's social interaction committee includes representation from 20 burgeoning young adults groups, ranging from Israel-based organizations like Alliance Weizmann and Israel Bonds, to YAD, Camp B'nai Brith, the Communauté Sépharade du Québec and the Sephardic Education Centre.
- The much-emulated In Montreal will continue to be a ProMontreal centrepiece, with plans including a resource guide. ProMontreal itself is also gearing towards a spring "young adult fair" and planning to launch a hotline that would serve as a sort of one-stop shopping number for young adult group activities.
- Campaign revenues from the younger generation are way up and young adults continue to come to ProMontreal programs.

If there appears to be one message Levine and Zittrer want to get across, it is that the Jewish community will maintain its "concerted effort to reach its young."

Federal government discloses case against suspected Nazis

By DAVID LAZARUS
CJN Staff Reporter

MONTREAL – On paper, the words take on an almost sanitized air.

Yet, these same words are hardly innocuous for the first two Quebecers the federal government is seeking to strip of Canadian citizenship and deport for covering up their alleged involvement in wartime atrocities.

The details of mass murder and cruel brutality, as well as the allegations of false representations the documents contain, will comprise the weight of evidence against Vladimir Katriuk, 75, and Ladislaus Csizsik-Csatary, 81, when their hearings come up in Federal Court next spring.

In the same court recently, government lawyers filed a wealth of material – including substantiating documentation and lists of possible witnesses from several countries – to prove its claim that each man should no longer have the legal right to call himself Canadian and should be expelled to the countries from which they came.

Both men have denied the allegations and are fighting their deportations.

Essentially, the documents say that the Hungarian-born Csizsik-Csatary (a former resident of NDG who moved earlier this year to Toronto), while an officer with the Royal Hungarian Police stationed in German-occupied Kassa, Hungary (now Kosice in the Slovak Republic), participated in the round-up of its ghettoized Jews for their deportation to Auschwitz and other concentration camps in the spring of 1944.

"For at least two transports," the government alleges, "the Respondent (Csizsik-Casatary) was present for the embarkation, checking the Jews' names on a list."

Furthermore, "The Respondent has admitted that he was present on one occasion during the loading of Jews onto trains bound for the concentration camps."

In 1947, a "People's Court" in Kosice (formerly Kassa) issued a warrant for Csizsik-Casatary's arrest for crimes related to his collaboration in the "confinement and mistreatment of Jews and their deportation to Auschwitz." He was tried in absentia , convicted, and sentenced to death in June 1948.

Katriuk, a beekeeper who lives in the Rosemont area of Montreal but spends most of his time in his country home in Ormstown, is being accused of having committed actual atrocities in 1942 and 1943 against civilians while serving as an SS squad leader with the notorious Schutzmannschaft no. 118.

The government alleges that Katriuk, who was born in Lujani, Romania (now part of the Ukraine) but claimed Yugoslavia as his birthplace, was a member of the SS battalion when it committed numerous mass murders of civilian and Jewish populations in various parts of the Ukraine and Belorussia.

"The Respondent participated in operations involving his battalions in Chmelevichi, Guba, Khatyn, Veleika and Osovy," the government alleges.

"During these operations, over 100 civilians were killed, mostly old people and children, and numerous homes were set on fire. In many cases, civilians died after being trapped in their burning structures."

Through the spring and summer of 1943, the government further says, Katriuk was a member of the same SS battalion, then part of a larger Kampfrugruppe Gottberg SS unit, when it killed thousands of innocent civilions, including 33,000 in Minsk. One-third of them were Jews.

According to a 1987 Tass report, Katriuk was also tried in absentia and found to be the commander of a death squad.

Education in two religions incongruent: CCRJ

By JANICE ARNOLD
CJN Staff Reporter

MONTREAL – Children of interfaith couples should no longer be allowed to enrol in the Reform movement's day or supplementary schools or participate in life cycle events like bnei mitzvot, if they are also receiving formal education in another religion, the Canadian Council for Reform Judaism (CCRJ) resolved at its recent 20th biennial convention.

The resolution, similar to one adopted by the Union of American Hebrew Congregations (UAHC), sparked the most debate and was passed by a vote of 39-12.

The CCRJ will encourage its 24 member congregations "in the strongest possible way" to adopt this policy.

Educating children in both Judaism and another religion, as some parents wish, is "incongruent with the mission of Reform schools... Without diminishing rights of parents in determining the religious education of their children, our Reform religious schools must, nevertheless, insist on fulfilling the purpose of making committed adult Jews out of Jewish children," the resolution states.

The movement will continue to encourage intermarried couples to send their children to Reform schools and to study for bar/bat mitzvah, but only if they have decided to raise them as Jews "exclusively."

Some intermarrieds are now educating their children in both parents' religions, a situation which the CCRJ finds insupportable. "It is theologically inconsistent for a person to identify as both Jewish and Christian (or as an adherent of any other religion)," it says, and such a psychological burden on children that it may "imperil their healthy spiritual development."

Judy Wubnig of Kitchener's Temple Shalom objected, saying the policy was "restrictive and narrow-minded. "If parents want to teach their children two religions, it's their business."

Dave Abbey protested that the Temple Beth Tikvah school in Regina only has four students now. Other objectors felt the issue should be left up to the school boards on a case basis, or that it is wrong to "close the door" on those who want to learn about their heritage.

Rabbi Irwin Zeplowitz of Hamilton's Temple Anshe Sholom also wanted the resolution tabled, not because he was opposed, but because it had already been adopted by the UAHC, of which the CCRJ is a region, and a negative vote would only put Canadian congregations "out of step," while a vote for would "only aggravate those against it."

A resolution on "inclusion of gays and lesbians" was amended, at the suggestion of Abbey, to include a clause requesting Reform rabbis in Canada to "study the question of same-sex marriages or commitment ceremonies to provide us with guidelines as to what Judaism offers gay and lesbian Jews." The resolution passed by a majority.

Rabbi John Moscowitz of Toronto's Holy Blossom Temple later said the matter is already under discussion, but no consensus has been reached. "There are strong feelings on both sides within the rabbinate."

Elsewhere, the resolution called on member congregations to encourage the "full inclusion and participation of gay and lesbian Jews in all aspects of synagogue life and to continue advocacy to gain equality in civil and legal rights for gays and lesbians in Canada."

The CCRJ also strongly stated its opposition to a bill before the Knesset that it says will "severely restrict" the ability of non-Orthodox converts to make aliyah.

The CCRJ says such a law will harm the relationship between Israel and the Diaspora and is a "contradiction of Israel's own basic values of equality, freedom of religion and conscience."

The bill would make no conversion legal unless it received the approval of "the highest religious court in Israel of the religion to which the aforementioned wishes to join."

The CCRJ thinks this amounts to forcing prospective olim to seek the approval of the Chief Rabbinate. "If the conversion document is not signed by Orthodox authorities, the request would most certainly be denied," according to the CCRJ.

About 200 delegates attended the convention of the CCRJ which represents 8,800 Reform Jewish families.

Art Benjamin of Toronto was elected CCRJ president, succeeding Charlie Rothschild of Waterloo.

Loftus looks at Nazi war criminals in Canada

By MOURA WOLPERT
Special to The CJN

HAMILTON – "American and Canadian Jews don't have a clue about their own history," said attorney John Loftus, a former prosecutor with the U.S. Justice Department's Office of Special Investigations and author of The Secret War Against the Jews.

Loftus was the guest speaker at a recent State of Israel Bonds-B'nai Brith Hamilton breakfast at Temple Anshe Sholom, where the honoree was Sheldon Frank, former United Jewish Appeal (UJA) chair and president of A.J. Frank & Son, Inc. Frank Pipe Company.

Appointed by the Jimmy Carter administration to find and prosecute Nazis living in the United States, Loftus later resigned, he said, when he discovered that the people he was supposed to prosecute were working for NATO intelligence.

Charging that war criminals had been shipped by Britain to Argentina, Canada and Australia, Loftus noted that "second to Argentina, Canada has the largest number of war criminals

Loftus spoke of how, during the 1948 War of Independence, "when no country in the world would sell arms to Israel," British newspaper tycoon, Robert Maxwell, spied for the Soviet bloc in Britain in exchange for Czechoslovak arms for Israel.

"Oil is more important." Loftus declared "The bottom line is to keep Arabs happy."

But "Israel has won," he said. "Israel is strong and American and Canadian Jews are the strongest."

Levy to visit Canada

By DAVID LAZARUS
CJN Staff Reporter

MONTREAL – Israeli Foreign Minister David Levy is scheduled to pay an official visit to Canada next month as part of a heightened effort by Israel and Canada to "expand their relationship," newly arrived Israeli ambassador David Sultan announced here last week.

Sultan, speaking at a local reception to welcome him and his wife, Adina, to Canada, said the visit by Levy will include the signing of a planned agreement on cultural exchanges. Sultan did not specify the exact date

Levy will be in Canada just before the two countries' Free Trade Agreement (FTA) goes into effect.

As a sign of the improved ties between Israel and Canada, Sultan said Levy's visit may well be followed by a reciprocal trip to Israel by Foreign Affairs Minister Lloyd Axworthy, and by mutual "exchange" visits by delegations from each country's parliament.

As well, Sultan said, Prime Minister Jean Chrétien and Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu will be seeing each other at a future meeting of world leaders in Portugal.

All these elements, Sultan suggested, are signs that Canada and Israel are in the process of nurturing their relationship.

"In short, prospects are good," Sultan said. "There is a new era in the relationship between the two countries," a sentiment he said was also echoed by Governor General Romeo LeBlanc upon accepting Sultan's credentials in Ottawa.

Sultan said the enhanced relationship will also include an intention to "intensify the political dialogue" with the Canadian government vis-a-vis the Middle East peace process.

Sultan said he hoped to see trade with Canada double to the $1 billion level by the year 2000.

He described as a priority the need to increase the level of political dialogue between Israel and Canada.

Sultan, whose previous posting was in Cairo, has already found the Canadian Jewish community's "warm and receptive" welcoming of him "beyond expectations."

Israeli tourist drowns in Lake Winnipeg

By MYRON LOVE
CJN Prairie Correspondent

WINNIPEG – Israeli metal worker Mihai Scintee's first visit to Manitoba came to a quick and tragic end in the waters of Lake Winnipeg on Sunday, Oct. 20.

Originally from Romania, Scintee immigrated to Israel five years ago after the fall of Communism in his native land, and married the sister of an Israeli living in Winnipeg.

Scintee and his wife arrived in Winnipeg from Calgary on Oct. 19 and went with his in-laws to a cottage on the east side of Lake Winnipeg. Sunday dawned beautifully and Scintee decided to borrow his brother-in-law's red canoe to go fishing.

When Scintee hadn't returned by 2:30, his brother-in-law set off to look for him. After two hours of searching for any sight of the red canoe or Scintee's bright red jacket, he went to the local RCMP station to report Scintee missing. He claims that the lone RCMP officer on duty sloughed him off.

(RCMP Staff Sargent Ken Allen reports that the matter is being "reviewed" by area managers.)

A friend directed the brother-in-law to the Coast Guard, which organized a search. Scintee's body was found by a local fisherman at 3:00 A.M. tangled in some netting.

Scintee's brother-in-law thinks his visitor suffered a heart attack when he hit the water. "We will never be sure exactly what happened," the relative says. "He no doubt lost his balance somehow. He was a strong swimmer though – he was in the Romanian navy for four years – and he was still wearing his lifejacket and his boots when he was found. If he were conscious, he would have kicked off the boots to try and swim. The water wasn't cold enough for hypothermia."

Scintee's body was flown to his home town in Romania for burial according to the wishes of his son from a previous marriage who still lives in Romania. Burial took place Nov. 13.

Canada Roundup

Multiculturalism Report

VANCOUVER – More media coverage of the benefits of pluralism and multiculturalism programs and policies in Canada should be encouraged by the federal government, says an 80-page report evaluating multiculturalism.

The report commissioned by the corporate review branch of the Department of Heritage and compiled by Brighton Research was released to The CJN by Multiculturalism Minister Hedy Fry, a Vancouver MP. It was issued to mark the 25th anniversary of the proclamation of a Canadian multiculturalism policy by then prime minister Pierre Trudeau.

Despite restrictions on the federal government's direct involvement in education, the report suggests there is a range of activities open to government in this field, such as curriculum materials which cover Canadian citizenship, human rights and public issues.

The report proposes that direct funding of ethno-specific organizations should not continue in its present form. Activities carried out under the banner of multiculturalism should be conducted directly by public organizations "that shape the life of Canadians," rather than through institutions or agencies representing sub-groups, as at present. The Department of Heritage should be a clearing house for organizations seeking government support. – Maurice Lucow

Jewish School to Host Farewell Reunion

WINNIPEG – With the consolidation of private Jewish education at a campus in south Winnipeg planned for next September and the resulting turmoil in the north Winnipeg Jewish community, the parallel closing of south Winnipeg's elementary Ramah Hebrew School has received little notice.

Under the co-chairmanship of 1969 Ramah graduates Shelley Werner and Marcia Cosman, the school is hosting its own farewell celebration and reunion on the weekend of April 19 and 20 for all alumni and anyone who has ever been involved with the school.

Ramah grew out of the Shaarey Zedek night school program. It was moved to its present site in 1958.

Cosman says organizers are expecting more than 500 people to attend the farewell reunion. She notes that the event is also a fundraiser for a new Ramah Judaica Collection, with funds going toward buying Jewish books, resource materials for teachers, computer software, games, puzzles and music. – Myron Love

News and Schmooze

HALIFAX – News and Schmooze, a half-hour radio program of interest to Jewish students and the wider Jewish community, has debuted on CKDU, Dalhousie University's low-watt radio station.

Host Viva Press, a Dalhousie student, and member of the Atlantic Canada Jewish Students Federation (AJSF), says the news and music show, with six programs already on air, highlights Jewish issues and offers interviews with local Jewish leaders. She is also programmer and technician.

"It takes a while to produce this show. I spend an hour downloading information from the Internet to use in the news segments (Jewish news from the local area, Canada and Israel), and a couple of hours to put the whole show together. We've done a show on Kristallnacht and interviews with people in the Halifax-area community, like Jon Goldberg (Atlantic Jewish Council (AJC) executive director), Yakov Feig (AJC programmer), Erin Sperling (AJSF president), and Rabbi Mendel Feldman of the Chabad Lubavitch congregation.

Press, a columnist with The Canadian Jewish News, says she started the program, which airs Tuesdays at 10:30 a.m., "because there are three Arab programs on the station now. It is important to have balance."

She laughs and says, "People at the station love the music," which includes the Habonim Youth Choir of Toronto and Winnipeg's Finjan.

A program of Jewish interest aired Sunday mornings for two years on CKDU in the early 1990s, hosted by Doreen Gordon of Halifax. – Joel Jacobson

JNF Education Shaliach Completes Tour

VANCOUVER – Itzhak Efron, eduction shaliach for the Jewish National Fund (JNF) in Canada, has just completed a 29-day tour of Jewish education facilities in Western Canada. The tour wound up in Vancouver and Victoria.

In a statement to The CJN, Efron said he met with teachers, educators and boards to distribute materials and he held workshops to discuss how to blend JNF material into school curricula.

"The next two years," he said, "are very significant in modern Jewish history. In 1997, we celebrate the 100th anniversary of the first Zionist Congress in Basel and in 1998, we mark the 50th anniversary of Medinat Yisrael." – Maurice Lucow

Court slams bid for publicly-funded day schools

Supreme Court said rights to public funding of religious education are limited to those who enjoyed them at the time of Confederation.

The court also ruled 7-2 against the provision of publicly-funded health care services at private and independent schools.

Pledging that the battle isn't over, Moshe Ronen, chair of Canadian Jewish Congress's Ontario region, told a news conference that the next step is "to dance the political dance with the government" and continue to press for funding. "Perhaps this is the right time for the government to look at eliminating this inequity by including in its reforms a correction."

That may not be as unlikely as it seems from a Tory government intent on cost-cutting. Last week, Ontario Education Minister John Snobelin said he "is willing to talk" about funding private and independent schools, once other priorities are squared away. "I have met with them in the past. I will meet with them in the future and we will discuss the historic grievances they have," Snobelin told reporters following announcement of the court's decision. "I believe it warrants special consideration, but I don't have a solution."

For many, the court ruling was a bitter letdown. Susie Adler, one of the parents who petitioned the courts and after whom the case has come to be known, told reporters she was "terribly disappointed and somewhat stunned by the inequity that continues in this province. The situation is morally wrong." Adler's two children attend Bialik Hebrew Day School at a combined annual cost of over $14,000.

Henry Koschitzky, chair of the Ontario Jewish Association for Equity in Education, said the Jewish community "held out hope that our highest court would recognize the glaring inequality of government fully funding one religious school system to the exclusion of all others. Sadly, this did not occur, and the message religious minorities take home is that here in Ontario, all are equal, but some are more equal than others.

"We hoped at the very least that the court would have placed independent and religious schools on an equal footing with public and separate schools in the area of health support services. For students with physical disabilities, the decision is a double blow."

Despite having exhausted all legal avenues, the battle "is far from over," Koschitzky pledged, adding that the community "takes heart" in Snobelin's recent statements.

Representatives of the Ontario Alliance of Christian Schools used somewhat stronger language, saying the Supreme Court has "established secularism as the national creed, beyond the reach of the Charter. Students attending religious-based schools will continue to be treated as second-class citizens, both in education and health care. We believe this is shameful discrimination."

Ed Morgan, the lawyer who represented the five Jewish parents before the Supreme Court, said he hopes Ontario will follow the example of six Canadian provinces which fund private and independent schools to varying degrees.

In the meantime, Anne Bayefsky, an expert in international law, told The CJN she believes Ontario's current funding structure "clearly violates" international conventions.

In a little-noticed development last February, Toronto parent Arieh Waldman took the funding case to the United Nations Human Rights Committee, arguing Canada has violated international law because Ontario does not fund its religious schools on an equal basis.

Bayefsky said the UN is not bound by Canada's Constitution, and she feels Ontario will be found to have violated human rights laws. "It may take a few years, but it will happen."

She pointed out that on at least one occasion, Canadian law was changed after the UN found that Canada had breached international human rights agreements.

Schools funded outside Ontario

Alberta: Accredited private schools receive about 35 percent of the cost of education – between $1,620 and $1,880 per student per year.

British Columbia: Most private schools receive funding varying from 35 percent to 50 percent of operating costs.

Manitoba: Per-pupil grants in the private system amount to 63 percent of those in public schools. Other funding, such as Resource Grants and Textbook Grants, are also in place. Public schools may also share transport, resources, facilities and health services with independent schools.

Newfoundland: All school systems – public and denominational – are equally funded.

Quebec: On average, the provincial grant at private elementary, secondary and collegial levels is about 62 percent of the cost for the same level in the public schools.

Saskatchewan: Eight private high schools receive funds amounting to 55 percent of grants to public schools, and 20 percent of the cost of any capital project.

Ontario, Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island: No direct support of independent/private schools. In Ontario, private schools are exempt from paying tax on their properties.

Israel denies report it plans to expand Golan settlements

By NAOMI SEGAL
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM – The Israeli government has denied reports that it approved plans for the construction of new settlements on the Golan Heights.

"There is no approval for the construction of new communities," said a statement from the office of Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu.

"Any step to build a new community requires a decision by the government, and no discussion of this sort is imminent."

The denial came after the Israeli daily Yediot Achronot reported on the planned construction of some 900 housing units in three new Golan settlements.

According to the newspaper, lands were already being prepared for construction by Infrastructure Minister Ariel Sharon, with the knowledge of Netanyahu.

The paper said the project was the initiative of the Golan regional council, which set a goal of adding 2,500 new homes on the Golan by the year 2000.

Golan council leaders said that after the initial reports, they were inundated with calls from dozens of young couples who were interested in the project, which would enable them to build sizeable homes with the help of attractive government grants and loans.

Syria's official press reacted sharply to the reports, accusing Israel of pushing the region toward war.

The state-run Tishrin daily said, "Israel's moves to build more settlements and to bring thousands of Israelis to the Golan shows that Israel, under Netanyahu and the extremist rabbis and generals, is deliberately trying to escalate tension in the region."

Syria has demanded the full return of the Golan Heights as a condition for a peace treaty with Israel.

Argentine police on alert to prevent neo-Nazi summit

By SERGIO KIERNAN
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

BUENOS AIRES – Police in southern Argentina spent last weekend cordoning off roads in an attempt to prevent a clandestine gathering of neo-Nazis.

Security officials in the southern Argentine province of La Pampa went on high alert after large signs were posted hailing the "Nazi Summit of the Americas" and inviting locals to receive the "new Fuhrer."

A local judge, Maria Garcia, initiated an investigation into who hung those signs as well as flags bearing swastikas. She then ordered area police to prevent the militants from meeting.

Authorities would not say which group called for the gathering.

But an official with the local branch of the Argentine Intelligence Secretariat said it suspected "an Argentine group with strong contacts with neo-Nazi organizations in Chile, Brazil and the United States."

Police also were apparently searching for neo-Nazis at isolated ranches. No arrests were reported.

The La Pampa office of DAIA, the Argentine Jewish umbrella organization, received "full guarantees" from the local government that the police "will prevent the meeting from taking place."

Budget cuts won't reduce military strength: IDF

By DAVID HARRIS
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM – There will be no reduction in the armed forces' fighting capability next year, despite the cuts agreed to by the military and the government, senior IDF officers said last week.

The 1997 budget already has been decided and will contain an NIS 825-million cut, the officers said during a briefing for journalists in Tel Aviv.

"We will not get involved in arguments with the Finance Ministry," said one officer. "The only issue on the table is Israel's security needs, and that means the size of the army and the extent of its activities."

The 1997 Defence Ministry budget stands at NIS 30.45 billion, some of which will go to non-IDF activities.

The IDF still is considering an increase in its spending on war preparation and standing security, despite the cuts. The cuts, it says, will have to come in other areas.

One of the largest savings will come when Rafael, the Armaments Development Authority, becomes a government company. Currently a wing of the IDF, Rafael has accrued a deficit of more than NIS 1b., much of which is met with IDF funds. The IDF also is interested in transferring the Merkava tank-parts production line into government control or the private sector.

The Treasury has agreed that an additional budget cut of NIS 2b., likely to be added to the total NIS 4.9b. currently being discussed in the Knesset, would not fall on the defence establishment, one officer said.

"The size of the IDF today is just enough to allow us to defend the country. However, I would feel far more relaxed if we had a larger stockpile of equipment," the officer said.

In stressing the steps taken by the IDF to economize, officers listed a variety of measures, including slowing the promotion process, reducing the number of hours spent in training and scaling down the amount of food distributed at breakfast and in the evening.

The IDF intends taking a close look at the wage structure of its permanent staff, where it says there are numerous discrepancies, such as senior doctors earning more than military personnel of the same rank.

small remaining Jewish communities in Poland.

Agreements to this effect have been negotiated in recent months with the governments of Hungary and Slovakia. Romania and Latvia have also expressed readiness to enter into relationships with a similar foundation.

Cimoszewicz's letter came in response to a memorandum from the World Federation of Polish Jews and the Association of Polish Jews in Israel.

It also came after Polish President Aleksander Kwasniewski told Jewish leaders in New York during the summer that he looked forward to working with world Jewish groups on the restitution issue.

The organizations submitted the memorandum to the head of the Polish council of ministers, Leszek Miller, after his recent visit to Israel and his meeting there with Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu.

The memorandum demanded that legislation now moving through the Polish parliament be amended to include mention that the restitution will be made to the foundation.

Cimoszewicz ignored this demand in his reply.

Instead, he said that the existing Polish Jewish communities are "the only competent body in Poland to represent Jewish religious interests and to act as heir for the communal properties."

He wrote that there are nine such communities.

But Naphtali Lau-Levi, deputy chair of the World Jewish Restitution Organization (WJRO), a spinoff of the WJC, said in an interview that six of the nine supported communities are "in effect fictitious."

He said the prime minister's position effectively held Poland's Jews, most of whom are elderly, for "ransom."

The prime minister's letter said restitution would cover 1,000 cemeteries, 228 synagogues, 70 prayer houses and several dozen other communal buildings.

Lau-Levi said this was a vast underestimation of the total property, adding that the WJRO's records indicate that there are alone 7,000 synagogues to be covered in a future restitution arrangement.

Some 3.5 million Polish Jews perished in the Holocaust. According to the WJC, there are now some 8,000 Jews in Poland.

Meanwhile, Swiss government and banking officials are said to be ready to come up with a sizeable restitution sum even before the conclusion of ongoing investigations into the extent of unclaimed Jewish assets still being held in unnumbered Swiss bank accounts.

Their readiness to move on the issue comes after the WJC and U.S. officials have launched a steady barrage of accusations that Swiss banks have hidden behind their secrecy laws in an effort to block the return of assets belonging to Holocaust survivors or their heirs.

It also comes after the WJC unearthed a series of recently declassified documents that it says proves that Switzerland, far from being neutral during the war, helped finance Hitler's war effort by laundering money for Nazi Germany.

In the wake of its disclosures, the WJC has called on Switzerland to make a full accounting of its financial role during the war.

Earlier this month, a probe by Swiss banks reported that it found little more than $8,000 (US) in unclaimed accounts possibly belonging to Holocaust victims.

Jewish officials counter that the total could reach into the billions.

Informed sources here said they expect ongoing informal negotiations with Jewish leaders to result in a "without prejudice" interim settlement by the Swiss government and banks early in 1997.

Seven Israelis missing in Ethiopian airliner crash

By BATSHEVA TSUR
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM – Seven Israeli passengers on the hijacked Ethiopian airliner that crashed last Saturday are still missing.

The Boeing 767, with 175 people aboard, cartwheeled into the Indian Ocean as the pilot, struggling with three hijackers, tried to bring it down off a beach after it had run out of fuel. Officials said 52 people survived the crash.

One of the hijackers was thought to have died in the crash. The other two survived and were arrested.

Members of the Israeli task force that landed Sunday afternoon at Moroni, near the site of the crash, dispersed immediately on different missions, a Foreign Ministry spokesperson said Sunday night.

The only confirmed Israeli survivor, 23-year-old Lior Fuchs, was released from hospital Sunday, Israel Radio reported. He told Israel Radio that there were three Ethiopian hijackers, who spent the flight in the cockpit and threatened to blow up the plane with a hand grenade. They spoke English, French and Amharic, and identified themselves as members of the Ethiopian political opposition who had just been released from prison.

He said nobody aboard had expected a crash landing, but instead thought there would be a refuelling stop, since the hijackers had demanded to be flown to Australia.

Fuchs said he had been in contact with the seven other Israelis on the plane until the crash and had worked with them to calm the other passengers and devise an emergency plan during the expected refuelling.

The missing Israelis are Israel Aircraft Industries employees Shraga Ben-Nissan, Amram Ben-David, Yehuda Soroka and Gad Levy; two businessmen, Yehezkel Raz and Elazar Levkovitz; and student Ya'acov Baron, who was traveling with Fuchs.

Although Israel does not have diplomatic ties with the Comoro Islands, the Muslim state in which the plane crashed, the Israeli task force was given permission to operate freely. The medical team left for the hospital, while the technical team went to help with the search for the missing passengers. At the same time, an attempt was made to set up a communications centre from the island.

Zvi Mazel of the Foreign Ministry, who is heading the team, was due to report back to the ministry's situation room – which continued to function for the second consecutive night – but, at press time, the lines had not yet been connected and the satellite connection with the Comoros was not operating.

Survivor Fuchs saved woman and baby

By Jerusalem Post Staff

JERUSALEM – Lior Fuchs, the only confirmed Israeli survivor of the hijacked Ethiopian Airlines plane that crashed off the Comoro Islands last Sunday, told Israel Radio how he rescued a woman and her baby after the plane hit the water and broke apart.

Fuchs said at one point the pilot announced he had run out of fuel and lost an engine and would lose the second within minutes.

"He made an emergency landing on the ocean. I felt a great jolt and was thrown out of my seat. Water came rushing in to the plane. Somehow I got out, I don't know how," he told Israel Radio from his hospital bed.

'I felt a great jolt and was thrown out of my seat'

Fuchs, who was returning home at the end of a six-month, post-army tour of Africa, said he fought his way up to the surface through water and pieces of debris. He said he does not know what happened to his travelling companion, student Ya'acov Baron.

"I saw a woman with a baby who was caught. I swam to her, released her, and inflated her life jacket and her baby's," Fuchs said. "We got into a boat together.

"There were a few more survivors and I think two-thirds of the plane was still floating. I don't know about the rest."

Student journalists learn to Do The Write Thing

By VIVA PRESS
Special to the CJN

SEATTLE – Jewish student journalists gathered for Do The Write Thing, offered for the seventh year, at the recent General Assembly of the Council of Jewish Federations.

GA '96 in Seattle

Of the 40 participants from Canada and the United States who came to discuss issues related to Israel, World Jewry and Jewish media, six of us were Canadians.

Among the leading figures and journalists in the Israeli and American Jewish community we got to meet, were Shimon Peres, Gad Ben-Ari and Avrum Burg.

The two main themes of the conference were Zionism and religious pluralism. Here is a synopsis of some of the sessions we had.

Ben-Ari, press secretary to Yitzhak Rabin, spoke about Zionism and democracy in the 21st century. The Jewish state, as envisioned by Theodor Herzl, Ben-Ari said, was to be a model democracy inspired by Jewish values.

"Israeli democracy made us proud throughout the years of war," he said. "It was a wonderful model. Today in Israel, democracy is not a model. Today it's worse than the day after Rabin's assassination."

Ben-Ari suggested that rather than dwell on the legacies of Rabin, we should learn a lesson and try to see where we went wrong along the way.

Peres also stressed the need to maintain a democracy in Israel. "We have to have a democracy that allows our differences," he said.

Gary Rosenblatt, editor of New York's Jewish Week, spoke of the importance of unity in the Jewish community.

Jewish journalists have a tougher job than those in the secular press, Rosenblatt said. "We're always walking a fine line."

We have an ethical responsibility not to embarass the Jewish community and we also "have to show the community we can deal with delicate issues," he said.

Burg, chair of the World Zionist Organization and the Jewish Agency for Israel, described Zionism as a state of mind, asking, "If Zionism is post-Judaism, then what is post-Zionism?" His answer: "Judaism, in a different way."

"We can't compare whose system [Reform, Conservative, Orthodox ...] is better," Burg said. "We are united in being Jewish."

In another session, Avrum Infeld, the founder and president of Melitz, the centre for Jewish and Zionist education, said our goal is to decide on what being Jewish means.

He maintained that pluralism is "giving legitimacy to different interpretations of the same commentaries and of the same memories."

We must have a common memory, have a common language, see Mount Sinai as the central brick to Judaism, have a state in the land of Israel, a home to the Jews, use Hebrew as a spoken language, Infeld said.

PM's backers, opponents protest

SEATTLE – Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu was unable to attend the General Assembly of the Council of Jewish Federations, but his supporters and adversaries came.

Netanyahu was scheduled to address the delegates on Nov. 14, but the situation in Hebron, kept him in Israel.

Three rallies were held outside the Washington Trade Centre in Seattle. Chanting, cheering and singing sounded through the crisp air. To one side of the Trade Centre, the Pro-Netanyahu rally gathered. Across the road, organizers of Peace Now and the Arab Alliance of Washington rallied their supporters.

"By Israel giving away more parts of Judea and Samaria and Hebron, this will not bring peace," said Morton Klein, head of the Zionist Organization of America.

From the Arab Alliance of Washington, chants of "No Peace, No Justice," were directed towards the pro-Netanyahu rally.

Former Hebron resident Ramsey Ahman carried a sign that read: Zionism is Terrorism.

With Oseh Shalom playing in the background, Seattle resident Ruti Kadesh paced back and forth with her sign that read: Sound Bites are not Enough.

"Netanyahu speaks really well, he makes good sound bites, yet nothing seems to happen," Kadesh explained. "He's a very polished politician. But, he's all talk."

Klein reminded his listeners that the world didn't say a word about Hitler's threats. An uproar of "Shame," rose from the crowd.

The bitter history of Jews is that we must believe the words of those who hate us, Klein said. "From Adolf Hitler to Louis Farrakhan to others we've learned that terrible words against Jews end up in bloodshed against Jews.

"We must speak out with strength to the world," Klein said. "And we must always remember that truth and justice and God are on our side."

Hebron negotiations seen as an acid test

By SHELDON KIRSHNER

Mideast Analysis

Eight weeks have elapsed since Israel and the Palestine Authority got down to serious talks over Hebron. But an agreement has eluded the negotiators, despite intimations by Israel and the United States that an accord was imminent.

The discussions, which began after a spasm of unprecedented violence in the territories and a subsequent summit in Washington called to defuse the bitterness, are widely seen as an acid test of the viability of the Oslo peace process.

If the negotiations succeed and Israel redeploys from Hebron, final status talks can begin as scheduled. But if no progress is registered, the diplomatic gains Israel has made since the signing of the 1993 Declaration of Principles may well be jeopardized, plunging the region into dangerous uncertainty.

The talks have unfolded in an exceedingly tense atmosphere. Israel has accused the Palestinians of procrastinating, claiming that their tactic is to persuade the United States to exert pressure on Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu now that President Bill Clinton has won re-election and is no longer beholden to voters. The Palestinians have charged Israel with trying to modify a much-delayed agreement that was essentially ready for implementation with the promulgation of the Oslo 2 pact in September 1995.

But this is only part of the problem.

• The Palestinians are furious that Israel is expanding its settlements in the West Bank, branding the move as a breach of the Oslo accord. In the past few weeks, the Israeli government has approved plans for the expansion of two religious settlements, Emmanuel and Kiryat Sefer, which have been granted permission to build an additional 3,200 new housing units.

• The Israeli army has been on alert for the past month, ever since receiving information that Islamic Jihad planned terrorist operations to mark the slaying of its leader, Fathi Shakaki, who was killed in Malta last year, reportedly by Israeli agents. Last week, Israel smashed an Islamic Jihad cell in Hebron, but warned that others still exist, thereby heightening the fears of the 450 Jewish settlers in Hebron.

• Egypt, the first Arab country to sign a peace treaty with Israel, is warning Netanyahu that a prolonged impasse over Hebron will worsen Arab-Israeli relations , further isolate Israel in the Arab world and unleash a new wave of suicide bombings, the last series of which, in the winter of 1996, demoralized Israelis, damaged the peace process and contributed to Likud's victory in last May's general election.

In addition to juggling these variables, Netanyahu is under immense pressure from his constituents and his caucus to walk away from the Hebron talks.

Proponents of this view, including the Chabad movement, have staged several noisy demonstrations in support of the settlers in Hebron. And no less a personage than Netanyahu's brother-in-law, Hagai Ben-Artzi, has suggested that he will be acting against Israel's national interests if he orders the withdrawal of Israeli troops from all but Hebron's Jewish enclave. Netanyahu can shrug off this imputation to his integrity, but how will he deal with colleagues, cabinet ministers and political allies opposed to any Hebron agreement?

Uzi Landau, who heads the important Knesset Foreign Affairs and Defence Committee, is one of the rejectionists. So is Ze'ev Begin, the science minister and son of the first Likud prime minister. He has advised Netanyahu to renege on Israel's solemn commitment to evacuate the Arab-populated sector of Hebron. Meanwhile, Michael Kleiner, a member of Foreign Minister David Levy's Gesher faction, has declared that a withdrawal from Hebron would be "a sad milestone in the history of Zionism." The National Religious Party, which holds nine Knesset seats, has implied that it may leave the governing coalition if the agreement goes through.

Netanyahu, who has been fighting for a better deal on Hebron, does not underestimate the strength of his zealous adversaries. Further delays in reaching an accord, twice postponed by the previous Labor party government, will make it easier for "right-wing opponents" to thwart it, he warned a meeting of European Union ambassadors recently.

In a bid to find a solution, Israel and the Palestinians have moderated some of their positions. But the main stumbling block remains – Israel's demand of " hot pursuit," or its insistence on pursuing suspected terrorists into Palestinian-controlled neighborhoods in Hebron. Netanyahu said last week that he intends to stand firm on this issue.

Under the Olso accord, Israel has the power to "engage" suspected terrorists in Palestinian autonomous areas. The Palestinians' interpretation is different, and as they they see it, Israel has no such right.

This dispute, however, has not affected the Israeli army's preparation for a withdrawal. It is ready to pull out of Hebron at a moment's notice.

The Week in Israel

Nov. 18

• A Hamas activist was killed in the West Bank, apparently by a bomb he was preparing for use in a suicide attack in Israel.

• The Israeli consul general in Egypt met with an Israeli Arab citizen who has been jailed in Cairo on suspicion of spying for Israel. Azam Azam, a Druze from the lower Galilee, told Yehuda Gabai that he was innocent of the charges against him.

Nov. 19

• Finance Minister Dan Meridor said the government would have to cut as much as an additional $700 million (US) from the 1997 budget if it wants to meet its deficit target. The government has already approved a cut of about $1.6 billion despite stiff resistance by both opposition and coalition members.

• Two border police guards who were filmed beating and kicking Palestinians trying to sneak into Israel north of Jerusalem to find work, were suspended and detained. Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu denounced the behavior of the police guards. (Later in the week the guards were criminally charged.)

Nov. 20

• Industry and Trade Minister Natan Sharansky postponed a trip to Russia scheduled for next week due to the death of his brother-in-law.

Nov. 21

• U.S. Senator Arlen Specter delivered a message to Israel from Syrian President Hafez al-Assad that there was no escalation on the Israeli-Syrian border. Specter had earlier carried a message from Israel urging the resumption of peace talks.

• At least three Palestinians were killed by an explosion in a West Bank village near Jenin. An Islamic militant, possibly preparing to launch a suicide attack against Israel, was killed in the same area last weekend when a bomb exploded in his hands.

Nov. 22

• In an interview with the daily newspaper Ha'aretz, Crown Prince Hassan of Jordan said that thousands of Jordanians have submitted applications for work in Israel, but their applications have gone unanswered by Israeli authorities.

Doctor's hobby a successful business sideline

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Dr. Larry Bacher's prescription for fun is Picture Chase Card 'N Dice Activity Game, his own award-winning creation that resulted from his frustration with some of the slow-moving board games played by his three children.

A family practitioner with an office in Scarborough, the 40-year-old Toronto native is also medical director of a nursing home and works at emergency rooms in two hospitals. He figured if he was going to pursue a hobby in his spare time, it made sense to pursue one that could include his family.

His wife Pauline and children Janice, 12, Jeffrey, 10 and Corey, 7, who have "played this game more times than most other kids will ever play it in their life," were his main testers. He refined the game for over a year before launching it himself in 1995 with a 10,000-game run produced by his company Creative Thought and distributed by Abalone Games. A third run is now in the works, and Bacher's hobby has become a business sideline.

The educational matching game for ages five and up, based on three-part sets of illustrated animal cards, won an Award of Excellence from the Canadian Toy Testing Council, which named it one of its 10 best bets for 1996. Recently it received the Parents' Choice Award in the United States.

Bacher is almost ready to launch his next project, an inexpensive hand-held brain teaser called Dot Challenge. Other projects of his include a game called Emotions, on which he worked as part of a team and subsequently produced. It is used in a number of North American schools to help young children discuss their feelings.

Picture Chase, sold mostly at small, independent stores, comes in two versions: African Animals and Pre-historic Animals. Part of its appeal lies in the vivid animal card illustrations. "I wanted as illustrator who understood children," Bacher said in a recent interview. He admired the work of Brenda Clark, who had illustrated Franklin the Turtle, but as a fledgling game manufacturer was hesitant about calling her.

His office nurse took it upon herself to contact Clark, who drew the African animal illustrations. A second Canadian artist, Steve Pilcher (Norbert Nipkin), stepped in to illustrate the prehistoric animals when Clark became too busy to continue.

"They both provided their artistic flair to the project," said Bacher, who is reluctant to take full credit for the game. "Yes it was my idea, but there was a lot of professional input and information gathered from my kids and friends."

Fine-tuning included eliminating a game board and incorporating a small (pencil case-size) vinyl carrying case to build in portability and increase the number of locations where the game could be played. One of the few complaints Bacher has received came from a consumer who needed the dice replaced after playing on a concrete sidewalk. (The pieces were subsequently modified to prevent the problem from recurring.)

Bacher takes pride in the quality of the game. "I don't know how many we'll sell," he said (he's "pretty close" to breaking even on his investment), "but whatever we sell will be exceptional. The main thing is that it's fun."

As a physician, Bacher has also sought creative solutions. He has become an emergency room storyteller, spinning his own interactive, treatment-related tales about the fictional Princess Dermis while he sutures little patients. "One of the problems in the emergency room is that young children lose it really quickly. Once they get upset, they don't want to talk to you," he said.

Bacher has been telling stories about Princess Dermis for about half of his 13 years in medical practice.

He doesn't see himself giving up medicine to enter a more creative field, however. "I enjoy medicine. It's, again, a problem-solving profession."

The recipes, compiled by Louise Fiszer and Jeannette Ferrary, are nothing if not eclectic. They range from couscous with saffron and vegetables to Passover biscotti.

The Children's Jewish Holiday Kitchen (Random House, $25) is tailor-made for kids drawn to the pleasures of the palate. Joan Nathan's compendium consists of 70 child-centred, mouth-watering recipes.

The Story of Hanukah (Random House, $4.25) is simply told and expertly illustrated, ideal for children ages five to eight. Words are by Bobbi Katz, while pictures are by Dockey Graves.

Jenny and the Hanukkah Queen (Penguin, $17.99) is a story of family, love, the power of imagination and the pull of society at large.

Jean Little's text pulses with charm and Suzanne Mogensen's illustrations brim with vitality.

Chaim Potok, best known for The Chosen and My Name is Asher Lev,, has written his second children's book. Entitled The Sky of Now (Random House, $21.50), it tells the tale of a boy who confronts his fear fearlessly. Recommended.

Now there's chicken soup for the soul at work

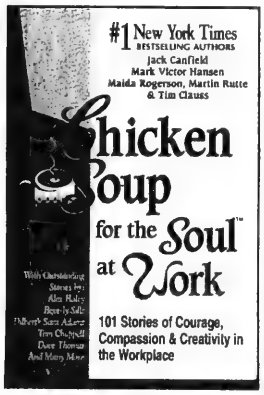
By JOSEPH SERGE
TAB news editor

If someone you know, or perhaps even you yourself, needs a little inspiration to get through a day of work, then Chicken Soup For the Soul at Work, 101 stories of Courage, Compassion and Creativity in the Workplace may well make a perfect gift.

The latest in the bestselling Chicken Soup For the Soul series, this is really a "title-tells-all-book."

The 101 reminiscences and anecdotes from people in all walks of life, have the power to move the reader in a way made for TV tear-jerkers can only try.

A long-haired, unshaven, dirty, obese man with a black motorcycle jacket is wheeled into the emergency room one night. The nurses view him as an untouchable: "Please let this one not be mine to tend to," was their unspoken cry.



The head nurse, Bonnie, decides to handle the situation herself rather than delegate it. As she tends to the patient's wounds and bathes him, she decides on a whim to give him a back rub. "This is what this place is all about," she thinks. "A place to heal."

After she has rubbed him down with baby powder, the man looks up at her and says, "No one has touched me for years. Thank you I am healing."

This and the other 100 true stories provide courage and strength. Maybe if we read one story a day with coffee and bagels in the morning, we might all go to work with a more positive attitude.

Put together by Jack Canfield, Mark Victor Hansen, Maida Rogerson, Martin Rutte and Tim Clauss, the book published by Health Communications, Inc. is available nationwide.

Acting game a treat for film buffs

By JOSEPH SERGE
TAB news editor

TORONTO — Just last week, a new game was waiting for me at the reception desk.

I opened it in front of the receptionist, the two of us started looking at it, and before we knew it, almost an hour had passed.

Targeted to 25 to 40 year-olds, Act One is a fun "party" game that draws on people's fascination with guessing lines from movies and television shows.

In a nutshell, the game involves one player picking out a movie or TV show card and acting out one of three scenes written on the card. The opponent has a set time in which to guess the name of the film.

One movie card for example has this scene: (James Earl Jones, playing Darth Vader, in a muffled sinister voice breathing heavily): "You have controlled your fear. Now release your anger. Only your hatred can destroy me."

The scene, of course, is from Star Wars.

Other movies you could act from include Apocalypse Now, Forrest Gump, (I thought I was going back to Vietnam, but instead they decided the best way for me to fight the Communists was to play ping-pong.) and 2001-A Space Odyssey.

Some of the TV shows include Melrose Place, Fantasy Island (Hey Boss, Dze plane. Dze plane.) and Seinfeld.

"The overall goal of the game is to have fun," said David Mikelberg, 37, one of the game's creators. "People don't just play the game, they relive the associations they have with these television shows and movies."

Mikelberg's partner, Danny Wilchesky, 36, first conceived of the game while attending a play, which lucky for him turned out to be awful. (We won't mention the play's name.) He realised that while the actors had little talent, they enjoyed being on stage and performing.

Wilchesky and Mikelberg both hail from Montreal and are now living in Toronto. The pair spent six years working on and revising the game.

Mikelberg and Wilchesky recently found a financial backer and have struck deals with Blockbuster Video, Toys R Us and Dufferin Game Room for national distribution. There is discussion of creating a television show based on the game. It retails from $34.99.

A cross between Name That Tune and Charades, the game can be addictive and fun. Definitely a sure hit at any university residence.

Scene 1: (Woman with European Accent)
They say that nobody dies here. They say that your factory is a haven. They say you are good.

Scene 2: (Liam Neeson compassionately, crying, desperately)
This car. Why did I keep the car... 10 people right there... 10 people... 10 more people. This pin. Two people. This is gold. Two more people... at least one. One more person. One more person. I could have got one more person... one more person... and I didn't.

Scene 3: (Ben Kingsley quietly)
The list is an absolute good. The list is life.

Two new Paul Zim albums strike different notes

By SIDURA LUDWIG
Special to The CJN

TORONTO – A Yiddish Delight and The Magic of Chanukah are two new CDs released by U.S.-based singer/song writer Paul Zim.

Magic has all the traditional melodies found in any child's Chanukah repertoire. Accompanied by The Dreidelettes and The Candlelites (children's choruses), Zim offers playful renditions of familiar tunes such as I Have a Little Dreidel and Y'mei Hachanukah.

His performances of melodic songs, such as Mi Y'maleil and Maoz Tzur, are respectable and at times soothing as a result of the combination of his rich, tenor and the children's clean, soprano voices.

The CD falls short, however, in its attempt to provide new, contemporary Chanukah tunes.

Zim composed the music and wrote the lyrics (along with Sy Kleinman) for many of the songs. While the music is often enjoyable, such as the lullaby Festival of Lights, the lyrics lack sophistication and Festival of Lights fails to develop any of the holiday themes. Instead, it uses cliché Chanukah images to produce strained rhymes, such as, "Give a gift each night – To each girl and boy / Make your dreidel start to spin – Chanukah means joy." Zim's contemporary works underestimate children's ability to enjoy and understand mature songs with in-depth meaning.

Included on this CD is Peter Yarrow's (of Peter, Paul and Mary) Light One Candle. This song, with its emphasis on remembering is a model for contemporary Chanukah tunes, capturing one of the many meanings behind the holiday in a haunting melody. Its maturity shines amongst the other songs.

To his credit, Zim tries to include an assortment of music. Both Chanukah Chag Yafeh and I Have a Little Dreidel segue into "rap lyrics."

To get a real taste of Zim's talents, though, listen to his CD A Yiddish Delight. Subtitled The funniest Yiddish songs ever recorded, it is a repertoire of both popular and less well known Yiddish folk tunes. All of the songs focus on the positive aspects of life, even in times of trouble.

Amol iz geven a Yid tells the story of poor couple who have to scrounge for Shabbat wine, fish and meat. Through a light, energetic melody, the song emphasizes the couple's joy in celebrating Shabbat, rather than the sorrow of their poverty.

A Yiddish Delight features The New York City Klezmer Jewish Jazz Band. Adding extra flavor and skill to Zim's powerful voice, the band provides sophistication to his recordings. Particularly notable are Ted Nash and Howie Lees, whose saxophone and clarinet (respectively) are so animated, they appear almost as backup singers.

This CD better showcases Zim's musical abilities. While spanning a wide vocal range, Zim performs the songs with gaiety and enthusiasm.Through his energy, he keeps alive and well the tradition of Yiddish music.

Helping kids is motivation behind record label

By HEATHER SOLOMON
Special to the CJN

MONTREAL— Wendy Wiseman thought she had put her music behind her when her father Sam died of cancer when she was 17.

But the birth of her daughter Sara, two years ago, gave her back the will, not only to make music, but to help the world's children while doing it.

That, in a nutshell, is the motivation behind Canada's fastest growing children's recording label, powered by the talent of Wiseman and her songwriting partner Sari Dajani.

The two met in 1980, the year Wiseman made her tentative reentry into music, writing popular tunes.

"We became so prolific, that in 1994, my husband Mark Diamond, advised us to form a company. Dajani's spouse came up with the name Kidzup – like 7-ketchup – Kidzup," Wiseman said.

Diamond negotiated a small business loan and invested some of his own money to acquire 40 percent of Kidzup. Sara's birth prompted him to give all of his shares back to children. "So, he formed the Kidzup Foundation, dedicated to helping children around the world." Juvenile Diabetes, Sun Youth and Children's Wish Foundation have benefitted from the foundation.

In addition, the record company's mandate is also to put out affordable products that are equally within reach of low-income families. It has just done that with five energy-packed albums appealing to various age groups.

Rock a Tot, the first collaborative effort between the duo, is a soft-rock style album featuring songs like I Got the Runny Nose Blues and I Love My Milk.

Last year, they landed a distribution deal across North America.

"By July we had 10 albums," Wiseman says. As the listener will quickly attest, quantity is not at the expense of engineering quality on the digitally mastered releases, 20,000 of which have so far been sold.

Bodywise, is a Kidzup aerobics album that makes food groups funky; Let's Talk Music speaks to the computer generation in rock terms and advises youngsters to say no to drugs and prejudice.

Other albums include Sleepy Time Rock-a-Byes and Animal Nursery Rhyme Time.

All Kidzup albums are released simultaneously in French with other vocalists taking Wiseman's place beside the multilingual Dajani. Major department stores, supermarkets and catalogue companies are all providing fertile ground for sales, as are the music stores, children's boutiques and toy stores.

Eitz Chaim Boys choir issues beautiful music cassette

By LEILA SPEISMAN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO – Many schools create choirs. Some even manage to be good enough so that not only parents and grandparents enjoy them.

Eitz Chaim Schools has accomplished this feat. In fact, the Eitz Chaim Boys' Choir, under the direction of Yehuda Gilden, has recently issued a tape, called simply, Toronto's Eitz Chaim Boys Choir. And a fine piece of music it is.

The choir, consisting of 44 boys and a backup mens' section of six, displays polish, enthusiasm and talent. Several of the tunes, especially Hinai Lo Yonum and Yismach display an excellent command of that very difficult choral skill, harmony.

The Nafshenu Orchestra, which provided the musical accompaniment, should be commended for not overpowering the singers, but instead adding to the beauty of the songs. The flute passages in Od Yishomo were especially effective.

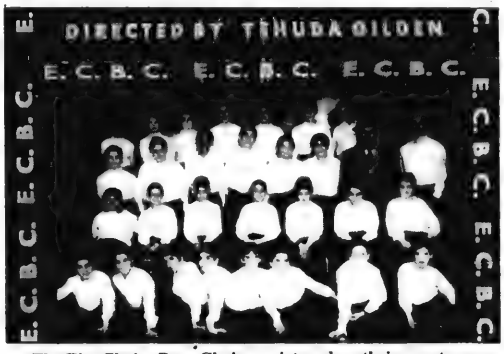
Besides training the choir and producing the tape, Gilden composed all the music. Dror Yikrah and Yihee Sholom were especially beautiful, with lilting, emotionally moving melodies, and kids will certainly enjoy the upbeat, drum-accompanied V'Alu and the military-like beat of Ma Yedidus.

Gilden also blended Sephardi undertones with the predominantly Ashkenazi musical tradition, at times seamlessly blending one into the other.

What one would have liked is for Gilden to have included in the cover of the tape the soloists on each song. They deserve that accolade.

Toronto's Eitz Chaim Boys Choir is the first tape by this very talented group. One hopes it won't be the last.

In Toronto, the tape is available from: Aleph Bet Judaica, Israel's, Matana Judaica, Negev and Sforim Warehouse.



The Eitz Chaim Boys Choir as pictured on their new tape.

When desperate for gift ideas...

By SHERYL HALPERN
Special to The CJN

MONTREAL – Maybe a great miracle has happened here and you've already wrapped up and hidden the children's Chanukah gifts. Maybe you're set for all eight nights. Or maybe – bet a few chocolate coins and a spin of a dreidel on this – you're desperate for gift ideas and dreading the inevitable dozen trips to the mall.

Stock up on wrapping paper – ribbon, bags of chocolate gelt, boxes of menorah candles and plastic dreidels – and try these gift-a-night suggestions. Perhaps they won't make every Chanukah moment a miracle, but they should make that expectant pause between menorah lighting and latkes easier to take.

Try tradition: Start your gift-shopping in stores which stock Chanukah menorahs of all sizes (some suitable for the Knesset and very large picture windows, some for birthday candles and 5-year-old fingers.) You can buy a big, sculptured one as a gift for the family, or a one tiny one, with candles to go, for each of the kids (bonus here: no more fights at candle-lighting time). Look for books, games, tapes and videos on the story of Chanukah too.

Buy stacks of books: Don't feel obliged to buy educational books (though books on dinosaurs or computer tips might fit the bill for someone). For a horror fan, get paperbacks in the Goosebumps series – a book a night should be about right. Or get one per night from the Babysitters' Club series (give the video of The Babysitter's Club on the last night as a tie-in.) For science fiction fans, paperback Star Trek novels or the latest SF bestsellers are good bets.

Check the magazine stand: Magazines and comic books are also possibilities. Find the latest in superhero comics on the book sale tables, and top off several nights of magazines – children's and teen mags, hobby and crafts mags, computer mags packaged with CD-ROMs, with a note announcing a subscription to one favorite magazine.

Bring home the movies: Videotapes are expensive, but you can [illegible] movie tapes for big gifts and add some shorter, cheaper tapes (of film classics or of favorite television shows) to fill in on other nights.

Don't panic: Don't give in to your Chanukah gelt complex. Factor in the gift from grandparents, aunts and uncles, cousins and friends of the family. If necessary, make a few old-fashioned gifts: Twist white, blue or gold tissue paper round some oranges or clementines, tie ribbons at each end so that they look like wrapped candles, and stud with polished real coins or chocolate coins. (Glue or tape these on.)

Trio still chugga-chugga-ing along for kid fans

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO – It's rehearsal time for Sharon, Lois & Bram, but there are no microphones handy. The veteran children's entertainers decide to hold pens as substitutes, and the show goes on, with interruptions to fine-tune a dance-step here, a hand motion there.

Eighteen years after the launch of their spectacular career — the likes of which didn't exist before — Sharon Hampson, Lois Lilienstein and Bram Morrison are still chugga-chugga-ing for their little fans – and the children's parents.

The trio's current show, called Elephant Party, is based on their new album of the same name, a slightly modified re-release of 1988's Happy Birthday. The show will run for eight performances at the Hummingbird Centre, Dec. 5 to 8.

"The show is about a party, so we [sing] about everything you do related to a party," said Hampson.

I am a little latke

"Of course, an important part is food," interjected Morrison. And with that, the conversation immediately turned to the pan of decadent home-made brownies with which Lilienstein had breezed into rehearsal. (The recipe can be found on the trio's Internet site.)

A culinary element of the new show is the song I'm A Little Latke, complete with a recipe set to music.

It's hard to imagine now that anyone hasn't heard of Sharon, Lois & Bram, but in 1979, when the trio was invited to perform at the Vancouver Children's Festival following the release of One Elephant, Deux Elephants the previous year, they were "blown away," recalls Hampson. They had envisioned the album, which grew out of their work with Mariposa in the Schools, as a one-time project. "We couldn't imagine anyone had heard of us."

They attribute much of their success to CBC Radio. "Part of CBC's mandate is to expose Canadian artists. We mourn its dying the death of 1,000 cuts," said Morrison.

Today, 65 episodes of the trio's award-winning Elephant Show can still be seen in television syndication, they've been national ambassadors for Unicef since 1988 and their 16 audio recordings have sold three million records in North America.

Candles Long Ago, their Chanukah mini-album released three years ago, includes a Chanukah song written for them despite their protestations that it couldn't be done. "We said, 'Don't be silly, you can't write a Chanukah song, it has to grow out of the tradition,'" recalled Hampson. The first time the trio heard the song, however, they were moved to tears.

Although they're known for old standards like Skinnamarink and One Elephant, they are always collecting new songs, said Morrison. Their newest one was written for them recently by songwriters Amy Sky and Mark Jordan in honor of Unicef's 50th anniversary.

Morrison and Hampson, who preceded Lilienstein to the pre-rehearsal interview, made a point of raising what has on occasion been a sticky issue regarding the charitable organization they represent. There is still "a mistaken notion," said Morrison, "because of the association with United Nations, that Unicef somehow is anti-Jewish and anti-Israel."

Israel was a beneficiary of Unicef from 1948 to 1966, and is now a donor country, Hampson pointed out. (According to a Unicef brochure, the organization's mandate is to "help children without regard to race, creed, nationality, status or politics.")

Sharon, Lois & Bram will perform at Unicef's 50th anniversary celebrations to be held Dec.11 in New York. Their tour of Elephant Party, which began in Barrie and Ottawa, will take them to West Palm Beach, Florida this weekend, Niagara Falls in December, Kitchener in February and Oakville in April.

Their mandate — for want of a better word — has always been "to find the best songs we could and have as much fun making good music as possible," said Morrison.

"Music for children and their families," added Hampson.

"We've never wavered from that," said Lilienstein.

Friends on and offstage ("We couldn't do this if we weren't," said Lilienstein), they still enjoy making music together.

At an age ("over 50") when others might be entertaining thoughts of retirement, they're still just entertaining. A new television series — as yet in the very early stages — is being planned, and earlier this year they joined the Internet generation: their colorful Web site had 11,000 hits shortly after it was launched.

Trainer gives Geena Davis killing machine look

By CINDY WAXER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO – In the recently released action flick The Long Kiss Goodnight (LKG), a blonde Geena Davis plays a muscle-clad, hard-bodied CIA assassin. But it's Amir Roizman, Davis' on-set certified personal trainer, who is really making a killing.

Roizman, 25, who owns the company EPOC-Toronto, started working as a personal trainer three years ago after graduating from McMaster University with a degree in kinesiology.

Since then, he has become a fitness guru to the stars by designing dietary and physical regimens for Ottawa Senators' goalie Damian Rhodes; Oliver Miller, a Toronto Raptor; and Gino Berti, a dancer and choreographer.

But Roizman faced his greatest challenge when he was chosen to physically mould a svelte Davis into a lean and mean killing machine when LKG was being shot in Ontario last winter.

Aside from being allotted only five months to train Davis, Roizman encountered difficulties unique to working with those in the film industry.

"Anyone can look good in clothes. But when you're exposed on the screen, everything has to look good," he says.

Subsequently, in order to prepare Davis for the film's scenes, Roizman created a customized program for her which included a strict no-fat diet and strenuous training.

However, the enormous physical strain Davis underwent performing countless push-ups and arm curls was minimal compared to the psychological pressure placed on Roizman to get Davis into top physical shape.

"If you screw up, they screw up. But if they do really well, it looks really good on you; so you have to work together."

In addition to working on a one-to-one basis with Davis, Roizman's expertise was sought on the set of LKG to assist co-star Samuel Jackson of Pulp Fiction fame in warm-up exercises and to advise Davis' director husband Renny Harlin on how to shoot several of the film's action scenes.

In fact, Roizman became so involved in the film's production that he was assigned a small part as a bad guy who must lift a plastic-wrapped corpse in a freezer off of a meat hook.

However, the corpse, which was covered with spray-on ice, kept slipping out of Roizman's hands, forcing cameramen to shoot the same scene almost 15 times.

"I nearly dropped [the corpse] on Geena," says the personal trainer-turned-actor with a chuckle.

What Roizman won't allow to slip out of his hands, he says, is the opportunity to physically prepare Israeli young men and women for the army. Having spent the past summer in Israel, where his parents lived for several years, Roizman discovered that young Israelis lack the training resources to physically qualify themselves beforehand for particular branches of the army.

But Roizman doesn't believe that it is only actors, athletes and Israeli soldiers who should attain peak physical performance levels. Rather, his vision includes setting up training centres within individual corporations so that employees can enhance their lives and productivity by temporarily trading in their cubicles for a gym.

"Would you give up a coffee break and a cigarette if you knew a personal trainer was going to come and take care of you for 15 minutes? I think most people, after they try it once, will say yes," Roizman speculates.

Although lifting a cigarette has always been easier than lifting a barbell, Roizman remains committed to bringing his clients to the highest levels of physical fitness possible. And in the film industry where the absence of cellulite equals celluloid celebrity, Roizman is discovering that the measure of a leading lady's waistline can be the start of a flourishing career as a personal trainer.

Israel may close loss-making companies, source says

By DAVID HARRIS
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — The government will close down many of the state-owned, loss-making companies, rather than privatize them, a senior government source said recently.

The Prime Minister's Office is also considering asset-stripping El Al, which is expected to report a $100 million (US) loss for 1996, the source said.

Full details of the government's privatization plans are expected to be announced at a media conference in the coming days.

"I hope we'll be able to [announce] this before the end of November, or by the very latest in the first week of next month," said Moshe Leon, in charge of privatization in the Prime Minister's Office.

The government has already begun the privatization process, according to the source.

"We have no intention of waiting for a press conference to begin work," said the source, who is one of those responsible for the privatization program.

So far no one in government is prepared to say which companies will be closed down, but it seems likely the smaller, loss-making businesses will be the first to go.

The sectors in which companies are reporting the biggest debts are agriculture, industry, trade and chemicals, with the biggest losses of all in the defence industries. Those reporting the largest losses in 1995 included Israel Chemicals Ltd., Rotem Industries Ltd., Agricultural Bank of Israel Ltd., Israel Aircraft Industries Ltd. and TAAS-Israel Industry.

The government also owns non-profit-making companies such as Israel Oceanographic and Limnological Research Ltd., the Israel Wine Institute and the Israel Consumer Council. These too could be subject to closures.

The government has set a target of owning no companies at all, but also is making clear it is physically impossible to begin work on all the companies next year.

The large monopolies, such as the Israel Electric Corporation, will almost inevitably be tackled last, the source said.

In general terms, the government still favors selling shares on the markets, initially through Tel Aviv. However, according to the source, it is neither practical nor likely that all company shares will be sold this way.

"In some cases flotation just isn't appropriate," the source said. "Some on the list won't be floated at all, some will take the form of international flotations, and some by way of competitive tenders."

It is also becoming increasingly clear the government will not adopt the options method of sale initially introduced, highly successfully in the Czech Republic and proposed in Israel by former finance minister Avraham Shohat. The program involves distributing to the public, free options vouchers that could be used to purchase, at a discount, a package of shares in firms that stand to be privatized.

Poverty on the decline

By JERUSALEM POST STAFF

JERUSALEM — The proportion of poor families in the general population declined for the first time in six years, according to the government's definition of poverty.

It dropped to 16.8 percent in 1995 from 18 percent the previous year, Labor and Social Affairs Minister Eli Yishai said at a press conference here recently.

In real terms, however, last year's figures – 208,000 families – are higher – by 3,000 – than they were in 1994. The total number of "poor" individuals stood last year at 738,000 people, of whom 329,000 were children.

Yishai said he preferred not to bask in the relative decline, noting that the figures were still high.

"There is no reason for celebration here," he said.

The government's findings are based on a survey conducted by the Central Bureau of Statistics.

Reading Hebron's humor offensive

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO –It is sad that a play about such serious subjects as the massacre at Hebron and Palestinian-Israeli peace should be sub-titled, "A comedic quest for truth."

For Reading Hebron by Jason Sherman is not a true comedy, though the playwright uses the ability of Jewish people to laugh at themselves as a way of hurting them.

Since the hype sent to the media in advance states clearly that Nathan Abramowitz has come to the conclusion tht the Israeli government condoned the massacre of 29 Palestinians by Dr. Baruch Goldstein, how can the play be viewed as an honest examination of the tragedy.

It is all very well to say Abramowitz is a Canadian Jew searching for his identity, but not, in this reviewer's opinion, is it legitimate to use the Jewish penchant for self-criticism to clothe his search as comedy. I found it offensive when Abramowitz , in a burst of repartee, said "there's no business like SHOAH business."

Sherman has tapped once again into the mother lode of poking fun at Jews, which strikes a responsive chord with some theatre audiences. In League of Nathans, Abramowitz is disillusioned by what he finds in Israel. Now, some years later, the playwright has raised the stakes and blames the Israeli government for the Hebron massacre.

Along the way he overdoes the stereotypical Jewish mother's concern for her son and two grandchildren. Sure, this brings laughs, but for what purpose?

The acting by the five-member cast headed by Michael Healey is formidable, the direction by Brian Quirt ingenious, even brilliant, the set design by Dany Lyne clever and efficient. The wailing from inside the Tomb of the Patriarchs sets the stage crisply.

It's too bad that such a witty, and densely-layered script examining the conscience of one Jew is built on a fault line.

Mother Night an unconventional film

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
CJN Staff Reporter

"Be careful what you pretend to be because in the end, you are what you pretend to be."

The writer of these precious words is Howard Campbell Jr., an American playwright living in Berlin who broadcasts anti-Semitic and anti-American diatribes on German radio during the course of the Third Reich.

Campbell, in fact, is a loyal American who has been recruited to spy on Nazi Germany. But nobody knows it upon his return to the United States after the war, and Campbell, being a ham, milks it for all it is worth.

This, in bare outline, is the plot of the film Mother Night, now playing at Cineplex Odeon theatres. Based on a black comedic novel by Kurt Vonnegut, Mother Night is full of ironic turns and bizarre characters.

The movie, which stars Nick Nolte, begins in Israel as a van deposits Campbell (Nolte) in a Haifa prison courtyard. Campbell has been abducted by the Israelis to pay for his crimes. While awaiting his trial as a war criminal, Campbell writes his memoirs, which enables Mother Night to unfold in a series of seamless though rather lengthy flashbacks.

Campbell, who is married to a German actress (Sheryl Lee) who is killed in a bombing raid, settled in Berlin in the 1920s and was astonishingly successful. One day, while sitting on a park bench, he is approached by an American intelligence agent (John Goodman) and persuaded to masquerade as an arch Nazi.

On his broadcasts, Campbell lambastes Jews and snidely refers to the American president as "Franklin Delano Rosenfeld." He is certainly convincing as an anti-Semitic propagandist.

After the war, in New York City, Campbell wallows in poverty, shunned by all except an eccentric artist (Alan Arkin) and a white supremacist who considers him an icon of unbridled racism.

As might be imagined, one has to suspend one's sense of realism to embrace Mother Night. But if you're prepared to submit to its wicked humor and offbeat figures (a black Nazi stormtrooper, for example), you may well enjoy Keith Gordon's sometimes ponderous film.

The performances are fine, with Nolte suitably befuddled and Arkin perfectly caustic.

Being an unconventional and quirky film, Mother Night won't attract a wide audience. But for those who revel in such movies, Mother Night hits all the right notes.

The working title of the book is The Law of Treasures in North America.

"As Canadians, we're thrilled to be chosen to do this book," says Milrad. "It will deal with the ownership of works, importing and exporting of artworks, stolen objects, the markets, authentication of artworks, taxation and the impact of NAFTA in three countries."

Milrad, an avid collector of post-war artworks from Canada, the United States and England, has written legal works about the art market before. The Art World: Law, Business and Practice in Canada, which he co-authored with Agnew in 1980, remains a key reference tool for collectors and professionals alike.

An assortment of some 80 ceramic works and a large selection of abstract paintings from Milrad's collection is on display at the Castellani Art Museum of Niagara University, Niagara Falls, N.Y., until Feb. 2.

Vibrant symbol of Jewish rebirth

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
CJN Staff Reporter

BERLIN – For Jewish visitors, Berlin is at once intimidating and inviting.

Berlin, the seat of the Third Reich, is replete with Holocaust memorials and lingering memories of the darkest period in Germany's history.

Berlin, the capital of modern Germany, is a vibrant symbol of the rebirth of Jewish life in this nation.

The days when Berlin was home to 170,000 Jews are long gone. But today some 10,000 Jews live in this elegant city of 3.5 million inhabitants, and with the continued influx of Jewish immigrants from the former Soviet Union, the community is growing.

There are synagogues, day schools, kosher restaurants and clubs. Berlin's Jewish community, considered dead and buried by the mid-1940s, is back again, like Berlin itself.

Berlin has not tried to conceal its Nazi past. Berliners, like the vast majority of Germans, have tried to come to terms with this evil period.

In a sense, the Holocaust originated in Berlin, in a cream-colored villa – known as Wannsee House – where the decision to implement the Final Solution was taken at a conference of 15 top-ranking Nazi officials on Jan. 20, 1942.

Exactly 50 years later, the infamous building was converted into a museum and educational centre. Since then, about 250,000 visitors, 60 percent of them Germans, have filed through the premises, according to Norbert Kampe, one of the directors.

Ingeborg Huntzinger's memorial.

Wannsee House, on the shores of a bucolic lake in a leafy Berlin suburb, documents the Holocaust with methodical completeness through the medium of stark photographs, posters and illustrations. The most chilling exhibit is under glass, the yellowing minutes of the 1942 meeting which doomed European Jewry.

Back in central Berlin, on Grosse Hamburgerstrasse, there is a simple monument to the memory of 55,000 Jewish Berliners who were deported to concentration camps. Around the corner is an empty lot, the locale of Berlin's first Jewish cemetery, uprooted by the Nazis in 1943. Nearby, on Heidereutergasse, lies the unadorned site of the city's first synagogue, built in 1714 and levelled by an Allied bombing raid in 1942.

Close by, in a parkette in a drab neighborhood on Rosenstrasse, a visitor comes upon a haunted ensemble of red sandstone stylized sculpted figures. This is Ingeborg Huntzinger's memorial to the little-known Rosenstrasse incident of February 1943.

In the only recorded case of mass civil disobedience during the Nazi era, a group of courageous German women defied the government, pleading for their Jewish husbands' lives. The men were to have been shipped to death camps, but thanks to their indomitable wives, the order was rescinded. Indeed, several Jews who already had been sent to Auschwitz were returned to their spouses.

In a city full of Holocaust memorials, one of the most striking is on Lewetzowstrasse, in a playground just minutes away by car from the Tiergarten, the city's largest green space. A rusted-steel cattle car, adjacent to a leaning construct which lists the dates of the deportations of Jews from Berlin between 1941 and 1945, speaks volumes.

A visitor should also drop in at the Topography of Terror exhibit on Wilhelmstrasse, which catalogues the brutality of the Nazi regime, and the Check Point Charlie Museum on Friedrichstrasse, which partially documents the persecution of German Jews.

Visitors, too, may wish to walk through the disused Jewish cemetery on Schonhauser Allee, where some of the greatest personalities in German Jewry were laid to rest.

On Potzdamer Platz, a bleak no-man's land which symbolized Berlin's political and geographical division until unification in 1990, numerous new corporate office buildings are rising skyward. Called the busiest construction site in Europe, Potzdamer Platz, currently a tangle of cranes, will be the site of Berlin's central Holocaust memorial.

Berlin's new Jewish Museum, presently under construction on Lindenstrasse, is only one or two years away from completion.

The New Synagogue, on Oranienburgerstrasse in eastern Berlin, was rededicated in May 1995 after seven years of painstaking work. Torched during Kristallnacht, and heavily damaged by a 1943 bombing raid, the golden-domed New Synagogue, or Centrum Judaica, was restored at a cost of nearly $50 million.

Now a beautifully designed cultural centre, within walking distance of the magnificent Permagon Museum, the New Synagogue contains photographic displays of the restoration effort and of Berlin Jewry, past and present.

The Jewish community centre on Fasanenstrasse, in the western sector, is the acknowledged hub of Berlin Jewry today. Constructed on the ruins of a Reform synagogue which was destroyed on Kristallnacht, the nondescript building – a mere block away from the Kurfurstendamm, Berlin's Fifth Avenue – contains a library, lecture and exhibit halls and a theatre.

Until mid-December, the community centre is hosting a photographic exhibition entitled Jewish Berlin, a survey of pre-Nazi times.

Berlin has several functioning synagogues. The neo-Romanesque temple on Pestalozzistrasse, where I attended Friday night services, was gutted on Kristallnacht and rebuilt in 1947. It is in the Charlottenburg district, one of Berlin's former Jewish neighborhoods. A plaque over the door leading into the shul's inner sanctum reads: "To the six million."

I also visited the Moorish-style Rykerstrasse synagogue, the sole remaining shul in eastern Berlin. The Nazis spared it only because they feared that the fire would engulf neighboring buildings.

Dollars For David Gifts From Canada Brighten Lives Of Israeli Children

Ami Finkelstein of Montreal has an emotional encounter with Israeli children who are looking forward to receiving their "Dollars For David" Chanukah gifts from Canada.

One hundred and twenty delegates to the Na'amat Canada Convention last month in Jerusalem learned how important Na'amat is to Israel's children.

"When I held the children in my arms at Na'amat's Residential Home for parentless children,' said Ami Finkelstein of Montreal, "my heart broke. I'm so glad that I can help make a difference in their lives." Finkelstein is one of 19 young leaders from across Canada who participated in special seminar activities held in conjunction with the Convention. "It's not enough to clothe and feed these children. We have to show them how much we love them. I never really appreciated before how important it is to send them "Dollars For David" Chanukah presents from Canada. It must make them feel very special to know that people way over here care about them!"

Newly-installed National President of Na'amat Canada, Erika Bloom of Montreal, explained that visiting the children at some of Na'amat's 850 day care centres helped all of the delegates to understand the psychological needs of the more than 25,000 children whose parents trust Na'amat to look after them each day.

"Na'amat's day care centres really change the futures of children from Israel's deprived areas," Bloom said. "First, we make it possible for both parents to work without concern about their pre-schoolers, so that the living standards of the whole family can be raised.Then we make sure that the children get both the hot nourishing food that they need for physical growth and the intellectual stimulation that will give them the head start necessary to guarantee their own future sucesss in life.

"But what we consider most important is to make the children happy and emotionally strong. That's where Dollars For David comes in. It would be really devastating for a child to be overlooked at Chanukah. We see to it that that doesn't happen to our kids!"

"Dollars For David" is a fund established in 1973 by Goldie Burstein of Toronto to buy Chanukah gifts for Israeli children who might otherwise be disappointed at gift-giving time.

To avoid singling out needy children from their peers, Na'amat gives a toy or book or doll, along with a candy treat, to each of the 25,000 children in their day care centres and Residential Home.

The money to pay for this is raised entirely in Canada, over 50% of it from readers of The CJN who respond to the orange envelopes that are enclosed in the paper. Thirty percent comes from Jewish school children in many cities across Canada, with the balance made up by donations from Na'amat Canada's 4,000 members and their friends.

Homestyle Gefilte Fish worthy of Strub's name

It was only a matter of time before Strub's, the leaders in beet horseradish, dill pickles and herring, added gefilte fish to their compelling selection of traditional products.

Strub's has been in business for nearly 70 years; Arnie Strub and his brothers Marty and Andy represent the fourth generation. Shortly after the Russian Revolution, their great-grandparents Michael and Sophie came to Canada. Following the family tradition, they made dill pickles each summer, storing them in barrels for the winter. In the Depression, when they couldn't make ends meet, they traded pickles for groceries. The pickles sold so well, the grocer asked for more; and the Strubs have been selling pickles ever since. The product line has expanded to include many traditional items such as horseradish and herring.

Homestyle Gefilte Fish is a family recipe which continues the Strub tradition. It comes in a jar, because glass preserves the natural taste. It has the same marvellous body and texture you've come to know and love in the gefilte fish your mother or bubbie makes. This quality is highlighted and complemented by the sharp, light tang of horseradish.

"You can't buy better anywhere," Arnie smiles; "and it's been a success from Day One." Now, Arnie is thanking you for your support. If you take the coupon below to any of the stores listed in the ad, you'll receive a FREE jar of horseradish with each 680 gm. jar of gefilte fish you buy until December 24/96.

The tradition continues. Look for Strub's to introduce more items in '97.

Guaranteed dates puts Singles Registry miles ahead

At the Jewish Singles Registry we know how hard it is to meet interesting people. Your job takes up a lot of time, you're not one for the bar scene, and while classifieds are great for selling cars, they are not ideal for meeting a partner. This is where our organization comes in. We're here to make dating fun and exciting, the way it should be.

What makes the J.S.R. so successful is our concept of allowing singles to select for themselves who they would like to go out with. By reviewing detailed and comprehensive biography profiles on each member, including photographs, members are provided with a clear "picture" of what their potential partner is all about. The J.S.R. process is very much a two way street. Members are given the freedom to be the selector, the selectee, or both. Once both parties give mutual consent, phone numbers are then exchanged. This system enables members to make informed and quality dating choices, without relying on others to decide for them. There is no matchmaking here.

Risk Free Service

What sets J.S.R. apart from all other such services is that you can join virtually Risk Free. Members get to go on as many dates as they wish throughout the year (providing both individuals have said yes), and are Guaranteed a minimum of 10 dates within the first year of their membership or they stay in the service for free. Call the J.S.R. office for more details.

An Engagement Every Six Weeks

The J.S.R. concept has been so successful that the service is averaging an engagement every six weeks. Hundreds of dates are arranged monthly, with thousands of selections made each year. With new members joining on practically a daily basis these figures are expected to rise even higher in the days and weeks ahead.

Open Six Days A Week

Another important factor which J.S.R. members benefit from are long office hours. Our office is open six days a week, including evening hours and Sundays. A professional and dedicated staff ensures that J.S.R. members are well taken care of on each visit. Members can make appointments as many times as they wish, and may choose as many people as they would like, throughout the year. Most new J.S.R. members are usually dating within one week of joining the service.

Jewish Continuity Is Our Business

With intermarriage still on the rise, J.S.R. accepts the challenge of being Toronto's number one Jewish dating service and continues to play a large role in the Toronto Jewish community. Whether you are looking to meet someone for friendship, a relationship, or even marriage, now is the time to sign up with the Jewish Singles Registry of Toronto. Call us today at (416) 398-7068. Study examines children of survivors

By LEILA SPEISMAN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO – Children of Holocaust survivors have either very much more intense personal relationships or very much more distant ones than the general population, a recent study has shown.

Dr. Danny Brom, of the Ezrath Nashim Sarah Herzog Memorial Hospital in Jerusalem and director of research at Amcha, a support, counselling and documentation organization, told The CJN that the study also showed that, contrary to popular belief, there is not more psychopathological behavior.

"This is important, because it takes away the guilt many survivors feel about how they brought up their children," he said.

This study, the first done especially on the second generation, he said, was a double-blind one – the interviewers didn't know they were interviewing second generation survivors, the survivors didn't know they were being interviewed because of that status, and neither knew the whole interview was actually to study the psychology and behavior of the second generation.

They all believed that the interviews were about coping mechanisms, he said.

The basic problem had been, he explained, that clinicians believed that there were serious problems with Holocaust survivors and their children: they were over-involved with each other; the children were unable to become fully independent; the parents were not able to regulate aggression in a healthy way; and they transferred their unresolved traumatic experiences to their children.

Most research had not corroborated these beliefs. However, Brom said, earlier research was conducted superficially, and did not include, as his study did, personal interviews.

Dr. Danny Brom

The interviewees, women between the ages of 30 and 45, were divided into two groups, matched exactly for such characteristics as age, birth order and educational status. The only difference was that one group was comprised of second generation survivors and the other was not.

The organizers, Brom said, then tried to discover if the study actually was blind – if the interviewers, for instance, realized what was really going on.

"Only one caught on – and she was a second generation survivor herself," Brom said. Interestingly, her results were the same as those who were unaware.

They then went to the survivors, and scored the severity of their parents' experiences during the Holocaust, he said.

"We were shocked to find an almost exact correlation between the severity of the parents' experiences and the difficulty the child had in creating a separate life."

Brom and his associates at the Laytner Institute of the Herzog Hospital are doing more research. One study is to correlate their research with a study done in New York's Mount Sinai Hospital of institutionalized second generation survivors. Another is to study amnesia in Holocaust survivors.

"Some survivors, including child survivors, have blocked out whole parts of what happened to them, trauma that has been fully documented," he said.

One woman, for instance, Brom said, told her therapist she had spent the war years in Indonesia. She had indeed spent time there – but she had returned to Europe, and had been sent to Auschwitz, where an aunt had found her.

Child survivors, he said, may have no recollection of the moment at which they were separated from their parents.

This is especially important, Brom noted, with Holocaust deniers claiming that survivors' memories are implanted by therapists, the so-called "false memory syndrome".

Neuropsychology chair named

TORONTO – Dr. Fergus Craik, one of the world's eminent researchers in the field of memory and aging, has been appointed to a new chair in neuropsychology at the University of Toronto (U of T) and Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care, a position jointly funded by both organizations.

The Baycrest Chair in Neuropsychology in the Department of Psychology, Faculty of Arts and Science, U of T, will promote scholarly links with the Rotman Research Institute of Baycrest Centre, and will strengthen research and teaching in neuropsychology at the university.

In his new position, Craik will have more time to devote to his research on aging and memory at Baycrest, but he will continue to teach undergraduate and graduate courses at the university.

"The chair is dedicated to maximizing research in neuropsychology, particularly the effects of aging on cognitive functioning," says Dr. Donald Struss, director of the institute.

About Seniors

Dear Jesse,

I have an 88-year-old grandmother who lives in a hospital. She resides with three other people in the room. Two of the three people are loud and mentally unstable. As a result of these women my grandmother seems to be in a confused state. We spoke to the Head Nurse, with no action being taken. What should I do?

S.E.

Dear S.E.,

You might suggest a meeting with the people who work in the department to discuss your grandmother's state of health from their vantage point. If you are still not satisfied with the results, then address a letter to the director of the hospital, with a copy to the president of the board of director stating your concerns. A response should be received within a limited period of time.

The next step would be a letter to the Ombudsman's office in the Health and Social Services department of your provincial government.

Readers are invited to send any questions they have for Jesse to The CJN. Jesse is the executive director of Jewish Support Services for the Elderly (JSSE) in Montreal.

Meuchzavim feel 'betrayed' by Netanyahu

By BILL HUTMAN
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

They call themselves "the disappointed" and "the betrayed." No one can count their number exactly, but they are out there, feeling gloomy and distressed, when they had hoped to be basking in the glory of a great success.

Opinion

The meuchzavim, as they are known in Hebrew, are an apparently growing number of hardcore backers of Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu, who voted for him because they opposed the Oslo agreements, but who in recent months have had second thoughts about their support.

Now, the meuchzavim face a major decision about how they should vent their opposition to Netanyahu.

For most of them, it is a question of whether to take to the streets again to protest against the government, as during the Rabin and Peres regimes. For a smaller minority of extremists, violence also is considered a potential tactic.

Security officials have issued repeated warnings that redeployment in Hebron is likely to spark a violent reaction in extremist Jewish circles, and that the prime minister himself might be a target.

Still, the meuchzavim are for the most part law-abiding citizens who are upset with the government and struggling with how to express their opposition.

"You promised, we believed, you betrayed" is the title of a statement released this week by the Women in Green, a group that was among the most vocal opponents of the Labor government and a strong backer of Netanyahu during the election campaign. Nadia Matar, the group's leader, says the slogan sums up the feeling today of many Netanyahu supporters who count themselves among the meuchzavim.

Representatives of a variety of right-wing groups, including Zo Artzenu and Women in Green, have been meeting in recent weeks to come up with a formula for, as they see it, "getting Netanyahu back on track." The Council of Jewish Communities in Judea, Samaria and Gaza also has been considering possible action.

The decision is far from simple. Protesting against Rabin and Peres was intended to benefit the political opposition. Today, despite the anger against Netanyahu, no one on the right wants Peres or anyone else in the opposition to return to power. The complexity of the decision the meuchzavim face explains the council's flip-flop in recent weeks.

At a heated emergency meeting three weeks ago, the council made what was presented as a dramatic decision to demonstrate against the planned redeployment in Hebron and the slowness of settlement development. The next day, the threat to take to the streets was dropped after a meeting between council heads and Netanyahu. Council of Jewish Communities members left the meeting saying they were promised settlements would be freed of restrictions on development.

Yet when the settlement restrictions were not lifted – at least not as much as the council wanted – it again voiced its threat to demonstrate against the government. Last Friday, there was a small sit-down strike by council members outside the Prime Minister's Office.

But the plans for wide-scale protests made at the emergency meeting remain on hold. Council leaders say they are reluctant to enter a public confrontation with Netanyahu and prefer to continue quiet lobbying to change government policy.

"You can't hold demonstrations every day," said council director-general Aharon Domb, in an interview this week in Ha'aretz. "You can't ignore the fact that the situation has changed. The tools that are used must reflect the situation. Public pressure is not just demonstrations. Organizing Likud Central Committee members can be just as effective."

The council, however, is under pressure to act. Under Rabin and Peres, grassroots groups were the first to call for big public protests, with the settlers' council eventually following. That may again be the case.

"Many in the national camp are slow to wake up," said Matar.

This week, the Women in Green came out strongly in favor of public protest against Netanyahu's policies in Judea and Samaria.

"Certainly, we can wait no longer, when all indications are that by silence, and by not criticizing Bibi, we are blindly showing support for a man who has not at all proven himself as yet to be a strong and inspirational leader," their statement said.

"While we do not in any way wish to partake in bringing this government down, we have decided that it is beneficial to the national cause to raise our voices in vigorous protest when we see the ominous signs of the direction which the present government is taking. Accordingly, we have decided to take decisive action criticizing Netanyahu for his failure to date to carry out what he had promised the Jewish people."

Matar said her breaking point came well before talks advanced on a Hebron redeployment, when Netanyahu agreed to meet Arafat over the summer.

"After four years of protests, of going to jail, I expected things to be different this time," said Matar.

Last week, as in the days of Labor, Matar again found herself dragged off in a police van, allegedly for disturbing the peace during a small protest in front of the prime minister's residence.

This week, Chabad, which during the election strongly backed Netanyahu, openly showed its displeasure with the prime minister's policies in the territories.

Thousands of Chabad followers converged on Hebron last week to protest any planned redeployment. Chabad, unlike the Women in Green, has the numbers and influence to make Netanyahu listen. Several weeks ago Chabad leaders met the prime minister to press him to make no concessions in the territories. They left the meeting disappointed.

Chabad spokesperson Menahem Brod said the movement has second thoughts about its campaign slogan, "Bibi – Good for the Jews."

"We have made our position clear to the prime minister," Brod said. "But we also know that we must be careful, because we all know that the alternative to Bibi is Peres or someone else in Labor, and that we certainly don't want."

Netanyahu, Arabs trade barbs

By DAVID MAKOVSKY, ARIEH O'SULLIVAN
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — On the eve of Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu's trip to Europe, he exchanged barbs with Arab leaders.

At the meeting of the Organization on Cooperation and Security of Europe in Lisbon, Netanyahu is expected to call for the establishment of a forum in the Middle East similar to the European one, although Arabs have dismissed the idea as premature.

The Arab League condemned Israel's expansion of settlements in the territories, warning such practices could destroy the entire Middle East peace process. However, it stopped short of accepting an idea reportedly favored by Syria that Arab countries reconsider normalization with Israel.

In a statement by the Prime Minister's Office last Sunday, spokesperson Shai Bazak said Israel "sharply rejected" such verbal attacks by Arab states and said Arab pressure will not succeed.

CJC to get Nazi files

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The private investigator who claims to have elicited descriptions of war crimes from Nazis or Nazi collaborators will meet with representatives of Canadian Jewish Congress sometime in December to pass along audio tapes of the killers' statements. The secretly-recorded tapes will then be given to Canadian law enforcement officials.

Steve Rambam of New York said he has been in contact with three Congress officials who are cooperating with his efforts to expose elderly Nazis or their accomplices. The Congress officials will transmit the tapes to those charged with bringing Nazi war criminals to justice. Perhaps current Canadian Justice Minister Allan Rock "will be different than every other justice minister in the history of the Canadian government and he will use our evidence quickly and efficiently," he said.

The spark in each one of us

Editorial

More than light, the candles of Chanukah bring acuity and insight.

Standing near the candles, in the company of our families, we usually catch a glimpse, even if only for a bare fraction of time, of the things that we often neglect. What the candles illuminate are the touching truths that live in the shadows and "busyness" of our daily lives.

The poetry that The CJN received from close to 300 children confirms this. Without guile or pretext, without layering or pretence, their songs are pure messages of the heart, and indeed, heartfelt messages of purity.

Many people regard Chanukah as the holiday in which the Jewish people won their religious freedom. But that is only part of the truth. The full truth is more accurately conveyed in the poetry we received.

Chanukah is the holiday in which the Jewish people won back the freedom to live according to the values of our ancestors. It represents the spark, the light, the flame, the soul in each one of us that is the most irrepressible energy on earth, created, urged and inspired by God to be, above all else, a force for good, living sanctified lives, bringing honor to the Jewish people and benefiting all of humanity.

It is not accurate to say there were two "winners" from each age category of poets. For all the poets were "winners" and all the poems were winning entries. But in the end, as we promised, we did highlight some of the poems. We chose two poems each from the adult and teenage categories, and four poems from the twelve-and-under category.

We also published additional entries alongside the names of the poets whom we felt deserved honorable mention. We thank everyone who sent us a poem, or who assisted or enabled others to send us a poem.

When you stand this year near the candles, in the company of your families, listen to the beating of your heart. Find your voice. Give expression to that wonderful, metaphysical sense of belonging to this great people and sharing in its great purpose. Sing the songs of Jewish life, of Jewish commitment and of Jewish history.

Look upon the candles in the manner that 12-year-old Adam Lazier would have us see them: "Forever ablaze, they are our spirit. They are the flame inside us all." And remember too, the words of 10-year-old Tamara Grundland: "These candles don't burn out."

Golda Meir, Israel's prime minister, is hoping through her visit with U.S. President Nixon, to re-establish the sagging American-Israeli relationship and to ask for a resumption of Phantom deliveries. All the indications point to her success in both aims.

The reasons why she has a better chance is that American efforts to achieve an interim Suez agreement are dead, and that the Soviet Union has resumed shipments of aircraft to Egypt.

LEVESQUE DISCUSSES SEPARATIST/JEWISH ISSUES

At a seminar on Canada and Quebec at Holy Blossom Temple, Parti Québécois leader René Levesque had this to say on the issue of Quebec separatism and its effect on Quebec's Jews:

"I know that history shows that a rise in nationalism means Jews get it in the neck. But what can I do about it? I can't change your history. However, anti-Semitism is not a significant French-Canadian characteristic and no special importance should be given to the occasional anti-Semitic statement from a political nut from one of the minor parties.

Ethnic leaders call for renewed federalism

By RON CSILLAG
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO – A coalition of Italian, Greek and Jewish leaders from Quebec has called for "urgent" action to renew federalism and recognize Quebec's distinctiveness.

During day-long activities here last week, culminating in an address by Intergovernmental Affairs Minister Stéphane Dion, the coalition called on Ottawa to implement a new course of action that would strengthen national unity and give priority to recognizing Quebec as different.

Leaders from the National Congress of Italian Canadians, (Quebec region), the Hellenic Congress of Quebec and Canadian Jewish Congress, Quebec region, (CJC-Q) unveiled a position paper entitled Three R's to National Unity: Reconciliation, Recognition, Renewal. As its title implies, the groups want Ottawa to patch up wounds left from last year's referendum by recognizing Quebec's uniqueness and rejuvenating federalism.

Stéphane Dion

The initiative stops short of calling for constitutional entrenchment of distinct society status for Quebec. Instead, it notes that the Québécois are in a "unique" situation in North America, and that it's "not surprising they seek to ensure that their language and culture are protected."

"We know that a significant number of francophone Quebecers seek a recognition of their place within Canada. While some may argue the contrary, our three organizations and the vast majority of the members of the cultural communities of Quebec strongly support the recognition of the unique contribution of Quebec to the Canadian mosaic."

The coalition cited a poll last spring which found that two-thirds of Canadians agreed the Constitution should recognize the fact that Quebec, while equal to the other provinces, is different mainly because of its language and culture.

"It is now time for us to work together to give concrete effect to this recognition," the blueprint states.

Coalition leaders, who first banded together five years ago in Montreal, told a press conference that their "most pressing need is to ensure the very viability of the country.

"This necessarily means that we finally recognize the unique place the French language and culture has and always will occupy within Canada. It is therefore essential that priority be given to this recognition, which is so sincerely sought by Quebecers."

The "biggest challenge" is to make Quebec feel part of Canada.

Canadians "must find some kind of formula to accommodate Quebec, based on good will and the understanding of diversity," said CJC-Q's Max Bernard.

Quebec is no more racist or intolerant than any other part of the country, added Bernard, who chairs Congress's national unity committee.

In the audience for the press conference was Dion, who said afterward that it's "very important" to see so many non-francophone Quebers supporting recognition of Quebec.

Dion spoke later that evening at Holy Blossom Temple to about 150 people, in a room where empty chairs outnumbered those present by about three to one.

The minister noticed that, and said it's not enough for people to show concern for Canada "once every 15 years," referring to the time span between the two Quebec referendums.

Quebec's separation – which would be "a terrible mistake" – would put tolerance at risk, Dion said in his remarks.

"There is a great contrast between the tolerance of Quebec society and the intolerance of the secessionist option. Understanding this contrast may hold the key to our unity debate."

Separation would also damage the spirit of tolerance in the rest of Canada, Dion said. In Quebec, it would weaken ties "above and beyond our linguistic or ethnic differences."

Dion said he sees no reason for not recognizing Quebec's distinctness in the Constitution, and that its purpose is not to hand Quebec more powers. And while the Liberals have recognized Quebec as distinct by a resolution in the House of Commons, the constitutional recognition of Quebec "must first be popular among Canadians. This reconciliation must be made in people's hearts, not just on a piece of paper signed by politicians."

A rich collection of women's writing

As readers of this column know, The CJN considers the encouragement of new voices in the world of Jewish creative writing to be an important part of its mandate. Recently I advised readers of the appearance of the fifth volume of Parchment, an annual literary journal of contemporary Canadian Jewish writing. Adam Fuerstenberg is now its new editor, having taken over the post from its founding editor Shel Krakofsky.

Last week I received a copy of the fall 1966 issue of the quarterly Canadian Woman Studies published at Founders College of York University.

The editors of the quarterly journal have dedicated the entire fall 1996 issue to Jewish women in Canada "to broaden the public record of Jewish women's experiences in Canada."

It is a magnificent collection of writing, an anthology of reflections, experiences, essays, fiction, poetry, visual art and book reviews.

The editorial describes the genesis of the publication. "When we called for submissions, we were overwhelmed with the response we received. Articles, poems, drawings, and paintings from across the country told a complex and multi-layered story. The voices were at once personal and political, providing both critical analysis and individual histories that crossed generations, continents and identities."

As the editorial suggests, the journal covers a broad range of subject matter, all of which are personal statements, uniquely expressed and, for the most part, elegantly conveyed.

The journal also contains a selected but quite comprehensive bibliography, running 3½ pages, on items related to feminism and Judaism.

Many of the authors whose work appears in the journal will be known to the Canadian reader: Norma Baumel Joseph, assistant professor in the department of religion at Concordia University in Montreal; Rabbi Elyse M. Goldstein, director of Kolel in Toronto; Michele Landsberg, author and newspaper columnist; Sarah Taieb-Carlen, professor of sociology and Sephardi studies at York University; and Miriam Waddington, author and professor.

But most of the contributors are not as well-known to the Canadian reader, thus making the joy and the intimacy of reading their work ever more the poignant experience.

At the risk of being unfair to all of the contributors to Jewish women in Canada, I wish to comment especially on two of the works, both of which, I believe, appeared for the first time in print in this journal.

The first work is a short poem Words of Hope. It was "created" not written, by The Terrace Holocaust Survivors Group, Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care, " a unique group of women, originating from a variety of different countries, cultures and lifestyles."

"I speak five languages,
But I have no words for the Camps.
The Eskimos have many words for snow,
But we know only one word for death.
I have only tears.
Enough tears for many lives.
I cannot cry and I cannot laugh.
I can talk, and I want to talk.
If the new generations will listen,
The Survivors might find words for hope."

The creators of Words for Hope have forcefully captured in one short stanza, the paradox of the impotence, power and possibility that exist side by side within the simplest, yet most precious form of human communication: words.

The second work also deals with a Holocaust theme. It is a short biographical story called For the Sake of Her Children written by April Shour Laufer, whom I happen to know.

The story is based upon the life of Sarah Mittelman Neuman, the author's mother-in-law.

It describes, in gripping detail, that single incident for Neuman during the war on which her life or death hinged, on which her survival turned.

Shour Laufer has written the story in an almost minimalist, though highly effective style. Deliberately downplaying descriptive detail, she manages nevertheless, or perhaps as a result, to convey heartstopping narrative in the nuance of subtle phrases, or in the symmetry of parallel constructions.

The very first paragraph of the story is illustrative of its style throughout: "The war is over and the three of them have survived a year of hiding, a year where they dared not reveal their Jewish identity. She is 26 years old, and a widow, her engagement lasted longer than her marriage. Her year-old-baby sits on her lap at the kitchen table. The baby offers up a smile, looking happily into his mother's delighted face."

The painful contrast between the young mother's age, 26, and her widowhood is poignantly evocative; similarly, the brief, almost anecdotal comment that her "engagement lasted longer than her marriage".

Shour Laufer succeeds in packing a great deal of narrative and emotion into sparse detail. She also cleverly and creatively interspersers the text of the story with various references from the text of the account of Neuman's biblical namesake, Miriam.

The parallelism between the two Miriams works because of the way the author carefully synchronizes the events in the Holocaust story with the events in the bible story.

Indeed, For the Sake of Her Children, carries the reader briskly along in a river of turbulent emotions in a manner which is itself almost biblical in style - condensed, cadenced and concentrated.

Like most of the personal tales of that generation, For the Sake of Her Children is a very moving story, written clearly and boldly with an endearing humility and with obvious reverence and respect for both the subject and the subject matter.

The rich, diverse, tearful, inspiring collection of writing in Jewish women in Canada is worthwhile, and I would say, even important reading. MBD

Heavy U.S. pressure on Israel seen unlikely

BY SHELDON KIRSHNER
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO – U.S. President Bill Clinton will probably refrain from trying to cajole Israel's Likud government into modifying its approach to the peace process, Israel's former ambassador to Washington predicted recently.

"Clinton is unlikely to exert heavy pressure on Israel," said Itamar Rabinovich, who was Israel's envoy to the United States from 1993 until this September. "It's not his style."

Instead, should he find Israel and its Arab partners resistant to pursuing a peace settlement seriously, Clinton may well "walk away" from the talks, leaving the parties to their own devices, he said.

Even if Clinton gets tough with the Israeli government, the U.S. Congress would probably "mitigate potential pressure on Israel," noted Rabinovich, who was here to deliver the Harry Crowe Memorial Lecture at the University of Toronto.

Rabinovich, who tendered his resignation following Benjamin Netanyahu's victory in last May's general election, explained that a significant number of conservative Republicans in Congress don't even believe in the Oslo peace process and, in fact, empathize with the policies of the new Israeli government.

In a survey of Israel's relationship with the United States since the Carter administration in the late 1970s, Rabinovich said that the whole notion of U.S. pressure on Israel disappeared from the political vocabulary with the election of a Labor party government in 1992.

That Israeli government, led by Yitzhak Rabin, embraced the land-for-peace formula and needed no external prodding to move the peace process forward. As a result, a sense of intimacy prevailed in Israeli-American relations, a quality that seemed absent before 1992.

During the preceding period, when Yitzhak Shamir was prime minister, the United States exerted a great deal of pressure on Israel, he said. As an example, he cited the early 1990s controversy over U.S. loan guarantees to Israel.

Rabinovich, a noted scholar who was also Israel's chief negotiator with Syria, said that Syria's president, Hafez al-Assad, appears in no hurry to resume negotiations with Israel.

Aside from thinking in " large historical terms," Assad is biding his time, waiting to see who will replace U.S. Secretary of State Warren Christopher, who is due to step down shortly.

'Certain comfort in the familiar'

Rabinovich's assessment is that Assad is still holding out for a deal "with a minimum of concessions on his part."

Now a professor of contemporary Middle Eastern history at Tel Aviv University, Rabinovich disagrees with the dogma that Assad is interested in the peace process rather than in peace itself.

Itamar Rabinovich

"His regime could live with peace," he observed. "But he can live without peace, too. There is a certain comfort in the familiar."

Assad, he added, refused to meet either Rabin or Shimon Peres "because he knew a meeting would produce an agreement" on the Golan Heights.

Rabinovich scoffed at a recent Israeli report that Rabin had offered Assad a complete Israeli pullback from the Golan in exchange for a full-fledged peace treaty.

Rabin was willing to make "significant (territorial) concessions," he allowed. But he did not offer Assad what he sought – an Israeli withdrawal to the June 4, 1967 lines.

Looking ahead to a possible resumption of talks between Israel and Syria, Rabinovich foresees two fundamental difficulties.

• Syria demands that negotiations begin at the point where they ended last March. Israel rejects this position.

• Netanyahu, who rejects the land-for-peace formula, is willing to make cosmetic rather than substantive concessions on the Golan. The Syrians seek a total Israeli withdrawal.

Assessing the results of Israel's protracted negotiations with Syria, Rabinovich said that Assad "had nothing in hand when he finished talks" with Israel last winter.

Israel and Syria engaged in "hundreds of hours" of discussions without reaching agreement on any of the key issues – security arrangements, the depth of an Israeli withdrawal and normalization.

In his formal address, Rabinovich said that Clinton considered the Israeli-Syrian track of the utmost importance, ostensibly because the United States viewed Syria as "the key" to geo-political change in the region.

Hewing to its policy of containing Iraq and Iran, Washington hoped to wean Syria away from its alliance with Iran, he suggested.

And while the U.S. has succeeded in isolating Iraq, it has not met with similar success in Iran's case.

Rabinovich declared that U.S. policy in the Middle East has suffered several setbacks since last summer – the defeat of the Labor party in the last Israeli election, the formation of a new regime in Turkey headed by an Islamic fundamentalist, the illness of Saudi Arabia's pro-American monarch and the attacks against U.S. troops based in that desert kingdom, and the victory of a pro-Iraqi Kurdish faction in internecine fighting in Kurdistan.

Ottawa museum to add pavilion on Holocaust

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO –A $7-million Holocaust Gallery pavilion at the National War Museum in Ottawa is to be built honoring Canadian Jews who served in our Armed Forces as well as victims of the Holocaust.

"The gallery will be a stand-alone theme installation more than twice the size of any other theme or topic gallery in the museum with a mimimum size of 2,500 square feet and will complete the thematic content of the Canadian War Museum," said Victor J.H. Suthren, director general, Canadian War Museum

The project won the unanimous support of the recent national executive meeting of the Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC).

Gerda Frieberg, a survivor and member of the local committee, told the executive that the museum's parent body, the Canadian Museum of Civilization in Hull, Que., has committed $5 million to the pavilion, to be started in the fall of 1998. Another $2 million must be raised, she said, appealing to all Canadians for support.

"We must get behind this project, if we can't raise the money it will die."

Rabbi Jordan Pearlson of Toronto is chair of the fundraising campaign, while Barney Danson is another member of the committee. The Ottawa representatives include Sarah Vered and Phyllis Teitelbaum. Among its distinguished supporters are Ray Hnatyshyn, former governor general and a director of the museum board, and Adrienne Clarkson, TV personality and chair of the museum.

The new Holocaust Gallery is a necessary addition to Canada's history, considering the country's poor record in accepting refugees from the Nazis, Frieberg told the CJC executive.

As well, its complete account of war service by Canadian Jews will correct a popular misconception. "Ordinary Canadians do not think Jews took part in World War II," she said.

Survivor accounts

The War Museum will bear the cost of ongoing programs for the gallery and its maintenance, Frieberg announced.

In addition to artifacts of the Holocaust, and personal survivor accounts, the gallery will also document repression against Jews in Europe during the rise of Nazism. A special section will deal with anti-Jewish sentiment in Canada in the pre-war period, including the Christie Pits riot in Toronto in 1933.

The catalyst for building the Holocaust Gallery was the 50th anniversary of the end of the war, she said.

Alhough he was not enthusiastic at first about the project being associated with a war museum, Nathan Leipciger, CJC Holocaust committee head, said he supports it now because more Jews would have died if the Allies had not won World War II.

Netanyahu's 'sincerity' for peace process questioned

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO – Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu wants to end the Oslo peace process with an agreement on Hebron, but can't because he realizes that his position would spark more Arab-Israeli bloodshed, says the former executive director of Peace Now in Israel.

"For Netanyahu, a Hebron accord is the final stage of the Oslo process," said Gavri Bar-Gil, the New York-based Kibbutz Artzi representative in North America.

"But, following the recent violence in the territories, Netanyahu understands that he has to proceed to avoid an explosion."

Netanyahu, he said in an interview before delivering the first Yitzhak Rabin Memorial Lecture, does not believe in the Oslo process. But he cannot undo it because Israel has crossed "the point of no return" in terms of its negotiations with the Arabs.

Nonetheless, Netanyahu has harmed the process, noted Bar-Gil, who was here under the auspices of Canadian Friends of Peace Now.

Israel's relations with Syria and the Palestinians have deteriorated. And the Likud government has dragged out the talks over an Israeli redeployment from Hebron, charged Bar-Gil, a former battalion commander in the Israeli army.

Gavri Bar-Gil

Furthermore, he added, Israel's Arab negotiating partners do not trust Netanyahu, whom he called "totally insincere" and one of "the most dangerous leaders" Israel has ever had.

By contrast, Rabin and his successor, Shimon Peres, were sincere in their desire to build on the achievements of the peace process, a point the Arabs well understood, Bar-Gil observed.

In his view, Israel cannot achieve peace with the Arabs unless it acquiesces to a Palestinian state or entity and withdraws from the Golan Heights.

Bar-Gil is uncertain whether Netanyahu will agree to these requirements. But many Israelis realize that a Palestinian state will not endanger Israel's security. And the Likud knows that a peace treaty with Syria is unattainable unless Israel cedes the Golan.

Israel's decision to expand its settlements in the territories violates the spirit of Oslo , he said. And the settlements convey a message to the Palestinians that Israel is not serious about peace.

"A big part of the settlements will have to be removed at the end of the day," he said. However, in his opinion, settlements close to the old Green Line should be retained by Israel.

Peres might have slowed down the peace process had he won last May's general election, he conceded. But the atmosphere of the talks would have been "totally different" and an agreement on Hebron's status would have been signed by now, he declared.

Peace Now's strategy in advancing the peace process is to mobilize public opinion and apply pressure on the government through mass rallies.

"It's our job to keep the flame of the peace process burning. It's a Jewish and Israeli interest, and must be promoted."

He urged Canadian Jews who care about Israel to support it.

Harris cutbacks hurting: Zbar

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO –As a result of a 21 percent cut in welfare benefits imposed by the Harris provincial government, a single mother, after paying rent, is left with $8 a day to pay all the rest of her bills.

"No matter how much baloney or tuna fish you eat that's pretty tough," said Morris Zbar, associate director, Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto.

The government cuts in welfare and housing and in services for women, immigrants, the elderly and the disabled have had a "terrific impact" on the Jewish community, Zbar told a packed meeting at North York Central Library Nov. 28.

The Federation is not taking a "political stance" on the subject , Zbar said, but he detailed the specific cuts which are causing hardship.

At the same time, in the discussion period, he disputed claims by several audience members that Jewish community leaders have failed to take action to help victims of the cuts.

"In two days we raised half a million immediately in responding," he said, adding that the federation is working with several church and ethnic groups in a coalition effort to convince the government of the harm its agenda is causing.

The meeting was co-sponsored by Tzavta, a progressive Jewish forum, and Tzedek, the Jewish Campaign for Economic Justice.

One participant said that while distributing parcels to the needy he learned that people are using their food money to pay the rent.

One in seven Jews, or 13 percent of the Jewish community of 168,000 in the Toronto area are living below the poverty line, Zbar said.

An extra 500 families are getting additional supplements from Jewish Family and Child Service as a result of the Harris cuts and there is far less money to combat spousal abuse.

In addition, 385 housing units have been cancelled, $9 million has been cut from job training and the Bathurst Jewish Centre is in danger of losing 32 day care spaces.

"Legal aid has been eviscerated," he said.

And "the word is that Branson hospital will go the way of the dodo bird and that will hurt our elderly population," Zbar added.

The Ontario government plans 50 percent more cuts to social services, noted Tzavta chair Simon Rosenblum, who also chaired the meeting.

"The Harris government is in deep trouble now and will be in deeper trouble soon," said Michael Mendelson, former deputy secretary of the Ontario cabinet.

He claimed Premier Mike Harris "hit the racist button" when he opposed employment equity in the election campaign. "Winning an election on that basis is horrendous," he said.

Mendelson said he opposed the spending cuts mainly because they would finance a 30 percent cut in income tax.

Jews who benefit from any income tax cut should contribute that money to a fund to assist those in need, Rabbi Dow Marmur of Holy Blossom Temple suggested.

The Ontario government was described as "arrogant, ideological and incompetent," by Arlene Perly Rae, wife of former Premier Bob Rae.

An announced delay in its economic statement proves that the government is in a state of "crisis management" and is "putting out brush fires," she said.

Toronto, Thunder Bay shuls get that long distance feeling

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO – The first telephone link of its kind joined people in synagogues in Thunder Bay and Toronto recently.

About 30 congregants at the Shaarey Shomayim Synagogue in the Lakehead city joined about 200 at Shaarei Shomayim Synagogue in Toronto in watching a film and firing questions at the speakers. Then people in both synagogues could hear the answers and discussion via a hi-tech telephone link-up similar to that used in TV talk shows.

"Many of the small communities have been asking us to bring them the benefit of the speakers and attractions we have in Toronto," said Jennifer Turack, director of community services and youth activities, Canadian Jewish Congress Ontario region.

A copy of the film Expulsion and Memory dealing with the Jews who were forced out of Spain by the Inquisition was made available to the Thunder Bay synagogue by its director, Simcha Jacobovici, who introduced it in Toronto and welcomed the northern group to the program.

In addition to the film, the evening featured guitarist Aaron Skitri, and Erna Paris, author of The End of Days, a book about the expulsion of Jews from Spain

The program was a celebration and fundraiser for Netivot HaTorah Day School, observing the 13th year since its founding.

Recently Turack told the Ontario region executive that families in the Peterborough area, Bowmanville, Oshawa, Timmins and London and its surrounding area have signed up with the Congress family outreach program.

A total of 32 students have enrolled in the high school outreach program and have started their learning by correspondence.

There will be a community Chanukah celebration in North Bay, a Tu b'Shvat party in Sault Ste. Marie in January, while a special program has already been held at the University of Windsor. A Kristallnacht ceremony that included people from the community was held at the University of Western Ontario.

Region chair Moshe Ronen was keynote speaker at Wilfred Laurier Unversity in Waterloo, delivering the Rabin Memorial Lecture.

The evening also included the latest Israeli film on Rabin, Seven Days in November. Members of the Kitchener-Waterloo community were in attendance, as well as students from the universities of Guelph and Western Ontario.

Rabbi contrasts Jewish, secular values in today's world

By LEILA SPEISMAN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO – There is a basic difference in how the secular and the Jewish worlds look at humanity, and it is important to deal with that difference, says Rabbi Aharon Lichtenstein, rosh hayeshivah of Yeshivat Har Etzion, a hesder yeshivah in Gush Etzion.

Rabbi Lichtenstein was giving the Israel Koschitzky memorial lecture at Or Chaim Yeshiva in North York.

Using the Syrian Greeks of Maccabean times as a synonym for the secular world of today, the rabbi noted that the main danger they posed was spiritual, not physical.

"There is an ideological conflict of weltanschauung [world view] and values," he said, of defining "the balance between what is, and what ought to be."

The Greek world, he said, focused on the natural world and man's place in it.

History was only important as it cast light on the nature of man, Rabbi Lichtenstein said, not "as the arena in which dramatic change could happen."

For Jews, however, history is pivotal. "The exodus from Egypt, Har Sinai and the patriarchs are critical points, as a result of which our lives and the course of human events changed."

The Greek world, he said, was concerned mainly with man."They admired him; they had confidence in him. Man was placed on a pedestal."

Highest on their list of priorities, the rabbi said, "was the development of the human personality."

This contrasts with the Jewish view, he said, which sees the ultimate goal of man as serving G-d.

"We cleave, serve, revere and relate to Him in the whole gamut of experience," he said. "Our emphasis is on leading a moral life, a religious life."

Man thus must develop his capabilities, but not merely for the sake of developing them – it is for the sake of serving G-d.

Another main difference between Jews and Greeks is that Jews "have a sense of the mystery of existence, overcome by G-d's role in the world. The Greeks felt that they lived in a world which even if it couldn't be controlled, could be understood."

That is not to say, Rabbi Lichtenstein went on, that we cannot derive benefit from Greek thought. Jews can accept their views that there is an order and rationality that gives structure to the world; that beauty is of value and so that which enhances beauty contributes to human life; and that art enriches and energizes life, providing us with a greater insight into the world around us.

"To the extent that we can enrich our own experience, we can enrich our own existence."

On the other hand, he said, the beauty intrinsic in Greek culture can detract from the study of Torah and of G-d.

"There is a passion and a dynamism in the Gemara," that can be lost in the Greek stress on order, the rabbi said.

"We must use [Greek attitudes] to enhance and understand our world, but we must be certain that what we integrate are our own values, not theirs. We must harness those values to serve HaShem and to heal our world."

During the question period, Rabbi Lichtenstein was asked for concrete suggestions as to how the educational system should deal with the conflicts between secular and Jewish learning.

The rabbi disagreed with those who ignore secular knowledge as a way to protect children from harm.

"If we don't deal with it, it filters in anyway," he said, and we will have no way of helping them deal with it in the light of what Torah teaches.

During the early years, he said, while there must be some secular learning, "there should not be so much as to decentralize Talmud Torah (the study of Torah)" or the place of Torah. Later on, he said, the basic values are already moulded, so there is less danger.

Israel Koschitzky, a founder and benefactor of Yeshivat Bnei Akiva Or Chaim/Ulpanat Orot Girls School, was praised by grandson Jonathan Koschitzky, a graduate of Or Chaim; by Rabbi Yehuda Felix, the school's first rosh yeshivah and now head of Michlelet Yisroel in Israel; and by incoming rosh yeshivah Rabbi Moshe Yeres.

Another name

We must now remember the name Drazen Erdemovic. Last week in The Hague, the slightly built, nondescript-looking, 25-year-old Erdemovic was sentenced to 10 years in jail for joining in the slaughter of hundreds of Muslims, men and boys, when Srebrenica fell two summers ago. He is the first person in 50 years to be tried, convicted and sentenced for war crimes and crimes against humanity. War crimes and crimes against humanity include deporting civilians and using them as slaves, conducting inhumane medical experiments and persecuting and murdering people because of political beliefs, race or religion.

True to the pattern of history's other war crimes trials, Erdemovic's testimony was as simple as it was disgusting. More than 1,000 Muslim men and boys who had surrendered to the Bosnian Serb army were taken by truck to a field some 70 kilometres away from the city. They were then lined up and killed. He admitted to murdering up to 100 people himself. The atrocity lasted five hours.

Erdemovic's "defence" was the same one which the accused pompously urged on their judges in the Palace of Justice in Nuremberg 50 years ago: "superior orders." Last week, as then, that defence was rejected. Indeed, warrants for the arrest of Erdemovic's superiors, Radovan Karadzic and Ratko Mladic, have been issued by the war crimes tribunal. They remain at large.

The sentence seems inadequate, grossly out of proportion to the nature and the number of the crimes committed. Since the tribunal's prosecutor, former Ontario Court of Appeal judge Louise Arbour, recommended the sentence based upon factors which she considered appropriate in the circumstances, we will not second guess the tribunal's decision. We are heartened, though, by her statement and hope that Erdemovic's trial and conviction will be merely the first of the nearly 100 individuals who have been indicted for their actions in former Yugoslavia and in Rwanda.

Next to the names Bormann, Goering, von Ribbentrop, Jodl, and others from the prisoners' dock in Nuremberg, we now inscribe the name Drazen Erdemovic, a reminder to us all that that crimes are committed, lives are wantonly taken, evil is perpetrated by individual human beings. And as a result, individual human beings, like the slightly built, nondescript-looking, 25-year-old Drazen Erdemovic, must bear the responsibility and be brought to justice.

Commendable act

But war crimes continue. Amnesty International reported last week that some 500 Tutsi refugees had been killed in eastern Zaire, the latest atrocity in a ghastly cycle of tribal vendetta and vengeance. If the perpetrators of these crimes cannot be brought to account, then it is urgently necessary to assist the thousands of civilians who fear that they may be the next victims.

The Canadian government, therefore, is to be commended for showing the initiative in launching the latest international humanitarian aid mission in Central Africa. About 20 countries will contribute to the multinational force. In all, there will be up to 2,000 soldiers, under Canadian operational command, whose task will be to try to locate refugees and then, once the refugees are found, to try to get them some food. There is no doubt that multilateral, political and expedient considerations were a factor in bringing the mission down to its final, smaller scale than that which had been originally proposed or perhaps even than that which might still be needed. But in an age when the horrible, haunting television images of the desperate and the starving usually travel further into our living rooms than into our conscience, a humanitarian aid mission, even one that is scaled-down, is an act of significant moral integrity.

Objects to caption on Arab woman

I am writing to express my disappointment in The CJN's decision to reproduce a photograph of a young Arab girl submitted by Yoella Teplitsky to The CJN's photo contest with a caption underneath the photograph reading "A young Arab girl seemingly at prayer." (CJN, Nov. 2, p. 3). The young woman has her eyes closed and is sitting on a rug in a meditative position with her hands resting lightly, palms upward, on her lap. Over her headcovering are the earphones of a walkman to which she is apparently listening. The printed description of the photograph evokes connotations that are mocking and pejorative to Muslims.

Is it certain that the young woman was actually at prayer when the photograph was taken?She may simply have been listening to music. But, assuming she was "seemingly" at prayer, the tape to which she was listening may have been one leading her into her devotions/meditation. She may have consciously assumed that pose at the request of the photographer. The possibilities are endless. But that is not the point.

Whether she was at prayer, or not, even if the photograph is a candid one, it constitutes a slur on Arabs and Islam. It's not difficult to imagine a similar scenario in a synagogue. We've all been witnesses to it. Someone speaking covertly on a cellular telephone, an adult congregant "semingly fasting" in Shul on Yom Kippur while chewing candy; groups of congregants chatting loudly during the Amidah. And yes, someone listening to a walkman. And so on. And so forth. Imagine a photograph of a young Jewish woman appearing in a Muslim periodical with the caption, "A young Jewish girl seemingly at prayer." Funny? No. Misrepresentative. Outrageous. Anti-Semitic, many readers of the CJN would cry out. And rightly so. As a Jew I feel ashamed of insensitive comments in a Jewish paper.

Who is that young woman? Does she know how her picture has been used/abused? Let us as Jews extend the same sensitivity to others that we expect others to extend to us, and that we extend to ourseves.

You don't need to go to Paris

Mark Mietkiewicz' The Jewish Highway columns are an outstanding example of The CJN bringing current and relevant information to your readers. In his two most recent columns on the subject of Internet Genealogy, e-mail lists and Usenet groups, he explained how we can start the search for our Jewish roots and extended families using the power of the computer and cyberspace.

His second column ends with a suggestion: "If all this searching has whetted your appetite, and you crave more human (as opposed to virtual) contact, then there's always the sixth annual Summer Seminar on Jewish Genealogy to be held in Paris in the summer of 1997."

In fact, there is an easier way for our fellow Canadians to network face-to-face. That's by attending meetings of one of the five Jewish genealogical societies across Canada, in Montreal, Ottawa, Toronto, Vancouver and Winnipeg.

Moralists apply pressure to Netanyahu

Since his election as Israel's prime minister, Benjamin Netanyahu has been widely under pressure enjoining him to comply with previous Israeli government's commitments in the "peace process" by all kinds of prominent and not so prominent personalities oblivious to Yasser Arafat's interminable violations of that process and to the bending-itself-backward Rabin-Peres government's cavalcade of concessions.

It is timely then to remind all those moralists that on May 17, 1983 the Lebanese government, led by Bashir Gemayel, signed the peace treaty with Israel, which, following Bashir's assassination, was swiftly abrogated by the Lebanese government. The event was readily accepted by the international community without a murmur of a whisper.

Isn't it proper then to demand that the present day preachers of sanctity of international obligations clam up and devote their solicitude to the plight of the Kurds, whose credentials for statehood by far outweigh those, if any, of the Palestinian Arabs?

Linked together in a chain that transcends love

By PHYLLIS LIFSCHITZ BLUM

The winter holiday of Chanukah with its sparkling lights and spinning dreidels is always a bittersweet time for me. In December 1972, on the night we were to kindle the second Chanukah candle, my grandmother, Ida Stenzler, whom I called Bubbie, died at the age of 72.

As the fall days grow colder and holiday lights brighten the streets, my thoughts turn inward. I prepare to kindle a candle too, but it is a plain, white memorial candle.

My grandmother lived in the same house as I did, from the day I was born to the day I got married at the age of 21 and moved to New York. My parents both worked. So throughout my childhood, it was my bubbie who listened to me, advised me, protected me and taught me.

I remember her with gray hair, smooth, unwrinkled skin, despite her age, and the gorgeous blue-green hazel eyes she'd often fix on me with adoration. My grandmother was short and wide, with a round face and broad nose. A shadow of fuzz covered her upper lip. She wore her straight, gray hair short; however, in the last years of her life, she changed the style to long and kept it pulled back in a bun, saying that it was unseemly for old women to have short hair.

She was a very quiet, humble woman, embarrassed by her heavily accented English. Her life had been difficult; smiles did not come easily to her. The odd thing was that despite her lack of self-confidence, everyone who knew her liked her — our friends, neighbors, service people — everyone was comforted by her honesty, kindness and quiet wisdom. Her love for her daughter and son-in-law and my brother and myself was fierce and unconditional. She was always telling me how beautiful and how smart I was. Her devotion to the four of us was total and her happiness was derived from caring for us.

Many of my memories of her are connected to my senses — things I could see, smell, taste, touch and hear. One of the images most vivid to me is that of her coming out of the bathroom late on wintry Friday afternoons. Her face was beet-red and a sheen of perspiration covered her face. Around her wet hair she wrapped a towel, turban-fashion, and she wore a flowered cotton house dress. As she exited the bathroom, a hot cloud of steam threatened to exit with her, for one of her greatest pleasures was taking a very hot bath. She rewarded herself in this way for finishing all of the weekend's cooking and cleaning before it was time to light the Sabbath candles. All day she'd speed around the house, working with one eye on the clock, mumbling aloud that she wouldn't get done in time, but she always did.

On my return from school each Friday afternoon, I was greeted by two very different smells that always heralded the Sabbath — freshly baked bread cooling and floor wax drying on the kitchen floor.

My grandmother was born Ida Slipson, in a small town in Russia. She was the eldest of five children, two girls and three boys, with a sick mother and a religious father who prayed all day and left the wage-earning to her and her brothers. Bubbie left Russia for Canada and lived for awhile with an aunt who took advantage of her naivete and treated her like a servant. A few years later, she married my grandfather, Joseph Stenzler, who was never a well man, and nursed him through much of their marriage until he died at the age of 52.

My grandfather was never able to work very much; so, in order to earn a living, my grandparents rented a large eight-room house and took in boarders. My grandmother spent all day cooking and cleaning for these boarders. She then lived with my mother, her only child, all her life. When we moved to the suburbs in 1961, she came too. She was by my side always.

My bubbie had a fur coat, a fat, brown, furry thing called mouton, with large beige glass buttons. It was quite long because she refused to have it shortened, and it had a high rolled collar. She never wore a hat, even in the winter, just her colorful kerchief. When the coat collar was over her ears, she was like a turtle burying its head in its shell for warmth. My brother and I loved when she wore her fur coat. We'd both sit in the back seat of the car with her, one of us on each side and snuggle very close, each of us slipping a hand into one of her coat pockets. I loved burying my face in her coat's velvety warmth and even when the car warmed up, we didn't move away.

My grandmother did most of the traditional Jewish cooking and my mother did what my grandmother called the "modern" cooking, like spaghetti and meatballs. How lucky I was to live with a grandmother who cooked all those wonderful foods that still evoke memories of warmth and love. An old advertisement says, "You don't have to be Jewish to like Levy's rye bread." That may be true, but every culture has its foods that bring groans of joy from people familiar with them. I am no exception.

It wasn't just foods that were wonderful; it was learning their names in Yiddish from my grandmother, using those words and connecting those words with her and with love. Learning Yiddish words from my grandmother made me feel special, like part of an elite group. Halishkes were not stuffed cabbage, knaidlach were not matzah balls and potato latkes were not pancakes. Pancakes were a breakfast food, eaten with syrup. Kugel was not pudding; pudding was Jello instant and came in flavors, and chicken parts were pulkas and fligels not drumsticks and wings. I have tried to continue my bubbie's "Jewish love connection" with my children. I've learned how to cook some of these foods and my children can name them in Yiddish.

After I was engaged, my grandmother would often give me something, like a teapot or a tablecloth, and say, "Put it away. It'll be a remembrance when I'm gone."

I would get upset and say, "Stop it, don't talk like that," denying her mortality. I could not imagine my life without her in it. She was right about those remembrances, though.

In the fall of 1972, Bubbie developed a stubborn cough. It lingered through many dull, windy weeks until the end of November when my father took her for a chest X-ray. They hadn't even returned home when the hospital called my mother at work. My bubbie had to return immediately to the hospital for more tests. It turned out to be lung cancer. At that time, I had been living in New York for 1½ years.

Newspaper articles have been written, asking, "Can you remember where you were when you heard about Kennedy's assassination?" or "Where were you when man first walked on the moon?" It seems that in the case of significant events, people can remember what they were doing to the minutest detail. That was how it was for me when I first heard that my Bubbie had cancer. The year 1972 was my first full year of teaching. I had just returned from my first open-school night. It had gone very well and I was feeling very pleased with myself. My husband met me at our apartment door and told me he had to tell me something. My mother had called when I was out and told him the diagnosis. I think he blurted out the news even before my body had settled onto the couch. A few days later was Thanksgiving, so we rushed p by car for the four-day weekend.

I will never forget the sight of my bubbie in that hospital bed. She had an oxygen mask over her mouth and nose and the nurses had put her grey hair into wispy braids. She looked old and scared. I was numb; I just stood by the side of her hospital bed. She always liked to see my new purchases; so despite our haste, I had remembered to bring a pink top and a turquoise bathrobe from New York. She held these items in her wrinkled hands and as she lifted off the oxygen mask to speak, she whispered to my mother, "Our Phyllis, she's some shopper, right?" My husband and I returned to New York and the call came from Montreal six days later.

When my father called to tell us the news of Bubbie's death, my husband and I were just sitting down to eat dinner. I can remember exactly what I was eating: hamburgers and spaghetti smothered in marinara sauce. I started to scream, rocking back and forth, holding on to the bottom edge of the kitchen cabinets. My father said he'd call back in a few minutes when I was calmer, but when he did, we were already on the way to the airport. I remember standing over my open suitcase, tears streaming down my face, choosing my funeral outfit so Bubbie would approve. She always said, "You always have to look your best, you never know who will see you."

We were picked up at the airport by my parents' closest friends; since it was an emergency, the airline had released our flight information to my father. Nevertheless, I was shocked to see them.

The day of the funeral was bitter cold, with a paralyzing wind sweeping across the cemetery and through us. I don't remember much, yet I do remember someone reaching over to my mother and tying a kerchief over her hair. It was so cold. I stood thinking of how my bubbie had always tried to protect me. Here I was, almost 23 years old, and this was the first funeral I had ever been to. There had been some funerals in the past which I had wanted to go to, but my grandmother's argument was always the same, "You'll go when you have to." Now I had to; she couldn't protect me anymore.

Her death came so quickly that I had barely had enough time to absorb the news of her illness before she was gone. I will always be grateful for that Thanksgiving visit to the hospital. One event, though, haunts me still. As we were leaving her room that Sunday morning to return to New York, she started to cry. My bubbie did not cry easily; of course, since I had moved to New York, we both always cried when we said goodbye and maybe that was the reason for her tears. My mother wouldn't let me go back into her room for another hug. She was afraid Bubbie would suspect the gravity of the situation. I will never forget standing in the hallway outside my bubbie's room, waiting for the elevator with tears pouring from my eyes. I never got that last hug.

Not long after my marriage, Bubbie had embroidered a very large tablecloth for me. On my visits home to Montreal, I would see her sitting in the kitchen, her glasses low on her nose and a large metal thimble on her finger, working a true labor of love on that cloth with its rainbow thread of orange-yellow flowers.

One day, in 1973, not long after she had died, I spent hours in my Bronx apartment, spreading out that tablecloth, folding and refolding it, hoping by touching where her hands had touched, that I would feel her presence and have her near me again.

Every year, on the second night of Chanukah, I light a memorial candle for my grandmother. Near me, stands my daughter, Heather, lighting her holiday memorah with its crayon color candles. She is my bubbie's namesake. The room is awash with the soft glow of candlelight. We stand together, linked to my grandmother in a chain that transcends love. It is a chain of spirit, of soul and I know that my bubbie stands with us and she is smiling.

Opinions

All Jews united in Judaism

The 65th annual General Assembly of the Council of Jewish Federations took place recently in Seattle, Washington. Many of you have probably heard about it. However, before I went, I had no idea what to expect.

By Viva Press

I was part of a New York-based program called Do The Write Thing. This unique program offers Jewish students interested in journalism a chance to meet other Israeli and North American Jewish journalists. We also met prominent people in the Jewish community including Shimon Peres, Yuli Edelstein, Natan Sharansky and Avrum Burg.

The two main themes at the General Assembly were religious pluralism and Zionism.

For me, the most influential speaker was Avrum Burg, chair of the World Zionist Organization and the Jewish Agency for Israel. Burg spoke about the need to get over our religious differences.

In a column I wrote this past summer from Zimbabwe, I asked, "Who is a Jew?" While there is still no answer, Burg, like other speakers at the assembly, shed some light on this issue.

First, let me explain to you who Avrum Burg is: he's a kippah sruga (knitted kippa) Orthodox Jew. He can't imagine living anywhere but in Israel. And he can't stress enough, he said, the need for a globally united Jewish community.

Burg said that the number 1 threat he sees in the Jewish community in the future, is mutual isolation. He acknowledged that each community has its own local needs, but "if we over-focus our attention on the local needs, then we raise Jews who are local-needs-Jews."

A Jew who is not connected to world Jewish solidarity will be very short-changed, Burg said. This type of Jew will not be able to survive.

In his address to the General Assembly, former Prime Minister Shimon Peres also discussed the problem of who is a Jew.

"Today if you ask me who is a Jew, I would answer a Jew is a person who keeps his or her children Jewish."

And this leads to the second point Burg stressed as important for keeping the Jewish community going.

"Fifty years ago we lost one-third of our people to the Holocaust, a very physical liquidation of the Jewish people," Burg said. "Today when we face the reality of 50 percent of people marrying out, we are losing people."

Assimilation is where we have to direct our attention. Burg said university students make up the third or fourth largest federation in North American Jewry. There are approximately 425,000 Jewish students in North American academic life and 85 percent of these students are concentrated on 105 campuses.

So we know where we the Jewish students and the next generation of Jews are. Now, the problem is to keep us part of the Jewish community.

Burg said that once "we lose the students, we lose them forever. But, if we keep them, then they will become dedicated to keeping Judaism in their life and family."

I think Burg is right. There are an estimated 300 Jewish students in the Atlantic Provinces, but only 70 or so come out to the Atlantic Provinces Jewish Students Federation (APJSF) programs. It's not that the APJSF is doing a poor job, but that the APJSF has to continue doing its job. Every year new students come to the activities we plan. Also, the Halifax community helps keep the Jews involved. During chagim the shuls are always open to the students. And we are invited for the chagim to the homes of the congregants. This, I think, is very important.

The 70 of us who do participate regularly and even those who come occasionally, are keeping Judaism alive. We are showing that we do care about keeping the Jewish community going.

But, as Peres and Burg pointed out, we have to overlook our differences. There are more and more families that result from interfaith marriages. In a generation like ours we can't afford to lose even one individual.

"Whoever wants to be a part of our people," Burg said, "we should welcome and accept as much as possible."

We can't squabble over which system, Conservative, Reform or Orthodox, is better. As Burg said, "We are all monotheistic. We are united in being Jewish." I agree.

Nationalism still a powerful force

Standing in a old English pub, some friends and I discussed the morning's lecture on the issue of nationalism. Not long after we had arrived, a drunk middle-aged man approached us, pushed a friend of mine whose accent clearly marked him as Irish and said, "I don't like the looks of you, Irishman," and walked off. The incident took most of us by surprise, but my friend calmly responded by saying that though it does not happen often, it is part of being an Irishman in London.

By Ilan Gewurz

Nationalism has been and continues to be one of the most powerful political forces of the modern age. The international system, in which the sovereign state is the central actor, finds its legitimacy in the moral claim that every state manifests the will of a given nation. The assumption is that every individual belongs to a nation and finds expression and representation in the international community through their respective "nation-state."

Over the course of the last few decades, the world has witnessed the rapid growth of transnational and multinational actors that have challenged the centrality of the state. While an international identity seemed to be growing, there was simultaneously an upsurge of nationalist forces which has served to redraw large portions of the map, and resulted in the redefinition of identity in Czechoslovakia, the former Soviet Republics, and in ethnic conflict in Burundi, Rwanda, Zaire and elsewhere. Here in Canada we have by no means escaped the impact of the nationalist trend. The recent debate within the Parti Québécois over the language issue in Quebec is but the most recent manifestation of such forces.

Nationalism is not a good or bad thing in and of itself. It is merely a form of identity which can be directed in a number of ways. We all belong to nations and thus we all subscribe to some form of nationalism.

In order to comprehend the forces of nationalism, its potential for destruction and its role in inducing hatred, one must first define the concept. Nationalism can be defined as a political principle which asserts that every nation has the right to political territorial soverignty. It has also been described as an ideological movement aimed at attaining and maintaining autonomy, unity and identity on behalf of a population deemed by some of its members to constitute an actual or potential nation.Who then defines the nation and what form of nationalism it will express?

Writing at the turn of the century Ernest Renan laid out two criteria which he believed defined the nation.The first is the possession of a common and rich heritage of memories, while the second is a desire to live together in the present. Inherent in this definition is the idea that nations are self-defining.

These definitions of nation raise questions about how the members of the nation came to have shared memory. If national identity is self-defined, who sets the parameters within which the definition is developed? Jews living in pre-World War II Germany, for example, saw themselves for the most part as Germans, though the nation clearly did not accept them as such.

One must then recognize the important role of the state in the process of nation-building. The state plays a central role in defining and establishing the limits of the nation, whether the nation develops in accordance with state policy or as a response to it. In the past, Macedonian identity, for example, included people who are currently citizens of Greece and Bulgaria. However, the development of a distinct national Macedonian identity within the borders of what has become the "Former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia," is largely a product of Yugoslav policies following World War II. Palestinian national identity, on the other hand, developed to a great extent as both a response to the emergence of the State of Israel and the fact that they were not accepted by any other Arab nation.

National identities do not stagnate, they evolve with our changing self-perceptions. The government of Quebec is still involved in the ongoing process of defining the Québécois. It is more than a question of language, it is a battle for the identity of the men and women who live in the province. I am an English speaking Jewish Montrealer and I think of myself as both Canadian and Québécois. However, in the process of building and defining the Québécois nation, I am clearly being excluded.

From Bonn to Berlin

Some time in the near future, the German government will move in its entirely from Bonn to Berlin. Meanwhile, the renovators of the partially destroyed Reichstag, the old parliament building, are busy preparing it for its new occupants. No one, however, anticipated that this labor would ential a peculiar dilemma, which is reflected in the following report from the Week in Germany.

By Rabbi Gunther Plaut

"How much history can the Reichstag take? The once and future home of Germany's parliament has been encased in scaffolding for more than a year as construction crews carry out a thorough renovation of the building to prepare it for the arrival of the Bundestag at the end of the decade. After ripping out plaster wall coverings installed 30 years ago, workers came upon traces of a noted moment in the Reichstag's history: hundreds of graffiti messages left by the Soviet troops who conquered Berlin in 1945. Officials overseeing the project, the Frankfurter Rundschau reports, have not decided if or how these vernacular inscriptions should be preserved for posterity.

"Before trying to decide the matter, the authorities overseeing the renovation commissioned a translation of the graffiti to learn what the Soviet soldiers had actually written. Many turned out to be Russian equivalents of 'Kilroy was here' or displays of wartime patriotism. Many more, though, were vigorously colloquial observations upon human sexuality that would, as one person involved in the project said, 'bring a blush to even a sailor's cheek.'

"One man's historical documentation is another man's smut, or so the ensuing debate over the Russian graffiti would suggest. Authorities like Berlin state preservationist Helmut Engel argue that the written traces of the capital's fall and occupation at the end of World War II are a fundamental part of the Reichstag's history that ought not be erased. The Reichstag, they add, is not only an important symbol for Germans, but also for Russians.

"At the moment, it looks as if the graffiti will not be removed and at least some will remain visible. The federal authorities overseeing the project told the Frankfurter Rundschau that technical considerations alone would determine how much of the graffiti would end up covered over. Those who would prefer to see the graffiti gone after the Reichstag reopens for business can perhaps nonetheless take comfort in the fact that most Bundestag members, unable to read Russian, will be able to admire the Cyrillic calligraphy while remaining happily oblivious to the sentiments expressed."

A personal postscript: For a brief time, between 1919 and 1933, the Reichstag was a symbol of a democracy that spelled equal rights for Jews and other minorities. Now that Germany has once again emerged as the centre of European power, I hope it will take up the old and all-too-brief tradition and make it a permanent feature of the new Germany.

The Kirshner File

A cornucopia of books...

Books of all kind for the Chanukah holiday season...

Being Israel's lingua franca, we

By Sheldon Kirshner

take Hebrew for granted today. But Hebrew, one of some 70 Semitic tongues and dialects, weathered periods of obscurity and neglect before its astonishing revival in modern Israel.

The full story of its development is told in A History of the Hebrew Language (Cambridge University Press, $39.95), written with self-assured erudition by Spanish scholar Angel Saenz-Badillos.

The author examines the origins of Hebrew through a rigorous analysis of biblical poetry, inscriptions and prose penned before the Babylonian exile. He proceeds to examine classical biblical texts and rabbinic and medieval Hebrew. His panoramic survey concludes with a chapter devoted to Israeli Hebrew, whose evolution he describes as a process "without parallel in the development of any other language." All in all, a fine reference work.

The ideal complementary volume to A History of the Hebrew Language is The Oxford English-Hebrew Dictionary (Oxford University Press, $110). Compiled and edited at the Oxford Centre for Hebrew and Jewish Studies, this hefty tome (1,091 pages) is the last word on current usage. Containing over 50,000 entries, with a full range of idioms, phrases, slang and colloquialisms, this dictionary also offers coverage of technical, scientific, academic, legal and medical terminology. In short, an indisposable book.

When Theodor Herzl, the founder of political Zionism, called for the return of Jews to their ancient homeland, he was given a distinctly chilly reception. The majority of European Jews, both secular and Orthodox, were uncomfortable with this new philosophy.

In Zionist Culture and West European Jewry Before the First World War (Cambridge University Press, $49.95 US), Michael Berkowitz expertly analyses the methods by which the Zionist movement insinuated itself into the hearts and minds of middle-class Jews and thus shaped notions of Jewish identity.

A century has elapsed since Herzl wrote The Jewish State, the blueprint of his Zionist vision. Julius Schoeps, a distinguished German-Jewish scholar, fleshes out the man and his ideas in a handsome, lavishly-illustrated coffee-table book called Theodor Herzl (Christian Brandstatter Verlag, 98 DM), published in Vienna. Let us hope that this German-language edition will be translated into English. There is surely a market for it.

The late Yitzhak Rabin has been repeatedly eulogized since his assassination last November. Shalom, Friend: The Life and Legacy of Yitzhak Rabin (Newmarket Press, $24.95 US) is a worthy tribute to a leader who was cut down in the prime of his career. Assembled by the staff of The Jerusalem Report, the book is an intriguing amalgam of fact and opinion leavened by anecdotes. Well worth reading.

At Rabin's funeral in Jerusalem, by far the most poignant eulogy was delivered by his 18-year-old granddaughter, Noa Ben Artzi-Pelossof, who brought tears to the sombre assemblage. She spoke simply and affectingly, and this appealing prose style graces the pages of In the Name of Sorrow and Hope (Random House, $25).

Not only is it a moving portrait of a soldier, politician and statesman. It is also a snapshot of a nation in crisis, as well as a plea for peace in our time. As she puts it: "We must remain vigilant to all the threats against Israel, from within and from outside the country. But we owe it to ourselves to complete the peace process."

Batya Gur, a Jerusalem teacher, has become one of the masters of the mystery novel. Her latest, Murder on a Kibbutz (HarperCollins, $14 paperback), ably translated from the Hebrew by Dalya Bilu, turns on a character named Michel Ohayon, a policeman whose investigation of a homicide forces him to penetrate the secrecy of a closed society. The book, Gur's third, unfolds against the backdrop of the intifadah.

Why did the intifadah erupt in 1987 and not a decade earlier? And what were its objectives? Israeli scholars Shaul Mishal and Reuben Aharoni come to grips with these and other questions in Speaking Stones (Syracuse University Press, $19.95 US paperback), which is based on the communiques issued by the two main bodies of the Palestinian leadership, the United National Command and Hamas. A revealing look into the psyche of the Palestinians.

Jews often claim that the Holocaust is unique, and perhaps it is. But haven't other people, namely the Armenians and the American Indians, been subjected to genocide? These imponderables are sorted out in exemplary fashion in Is the Holocaust Unique? (Westview Press, $35 US), a collection of thought-provoking essays edited by Alan Rosenbaum.

Pope John Paul II, in his reflections published under the title of Crossing the Threshold of Hope (Random House, $14.95 paperback), devotes one chapter to Judaism, and it alone may be worth the price of admission. He recalls his childhood friendship with a Jewish boy whom he still knows. He ruminates about the Holocaust. He calls Jews as "our elder brothers in the faith." He condemns anti-Semitism as "a great sin against humanity." His sentiments ring true.

Shorter takes...

A.M. Klein: Notebooks (University of Toronto Press, $55) reveals the character and artistry of a talented Canadian poet.

The Worldly Years (Random House, $32.50) by John English is an eminently readable biography of Lester Pearson, the former Canadian prime minister. Pearson's role during the 1956 Suez crisis is dissected.

Jews and the New American Scene (Harvard University Press, $22.95 US) by Seymour Martin Lipset and Earl Raab asks, and more or less answers, a burning question: Can Jews survive as Jews in a free and open democratic society?

Oxford Dictionary of the World (Oxford University Press, $49.50), with 15,000 succinct entries, is an invaluable resource on countries, people and places.

The State of the World Atlas (Penguin, $39.99) is an excellent visual survey of current political, economic and social affairs.

100 Influential People (Fulcrum Publishing, no price listed) actually lists 132 personalities, including a handful of Jews (from Bob Dylan to Steven Spielberg).

The Century of Warfare (HarperCollins, $38.95), based on an acclaimed BBC TV series, includes separate chapters on World War II and the Holocaust, the Arab-Israeli conflicts and the 1991 Gulf War.

The Quotable Soul (John Wiley & Sons, $20.95 paperback), edited by Claudia Setzer, is a handy compendium of wise, pungent quotations, among which are such topics as the Jewish High Holy Days, Jewish-Christian relations, Judaism and Islam.

Unto The Soul (Random House, $21 US), Aharon Appelfeld's newest novel, brims with the spirituality of Judaism and the moral nihilism of a brother and sister in turn-of-the century Eastern Europe. Another stellar performance by Appelfeld.

Rabbinic Reflections

Strengthening the miracle

By RABBI ARNOLD FINE

Each generation of Jewish children, even in this age of computers and the Internet, hears the story of the miracle of the oil on that first Chanukah with a sense of awe. Parents, grandparents and other adults, despite their sophistication, are also touched by the story.

Many authorities over the ages have asked why the miracle was necessary. A nearly contemporary sage, the great Hatam Sopher, went to great lengths to suggest that one bottle of oil serving as fuel for eight days showed that the teaching of earlier authorities has the power of Torah.

The Torah permits any kind of oil, even in the Menorah, the candelabra in the Temple. The sages who preceded the Hasmoneans, however, demanded a special and higher standard of ritually pure oil. Under the circumstances, with the difficulty in finding the sanctioned fuel, other oils of a lower standard could have been temporarily used.

The Hatam Sopher taught that the bottle of oil graphically showed the value, power and importance of the enactments and teachings of the sages. We are not a people whose intellectual and spiritual development has stopped; we are living and growing because of the spiritual and religious legacy. The very ferment, the new insights, the need and the ability to find answers in the tradition are the lifeblood nurturing all of us who start with the Torah and live by the Torah, the ever-developing and expanding understanding of what is in our heritage.

Too many of us, however, are like the children who are awed by the discussion and stories of miracles. We expect similar wonders to help us deal with our problems as a community and as a people .

A rabbinic directive declares we do not depend on miracles. The people of Israel were an integral part of the Maccabean struggle that culminated in the renewal of the Temple in Jerusalem and the process of removing the harmful foreign symbolism and the rededication, which led to the one day's supply lasting for eight. For too many today, the expectation is that this holiday will carry us. We cannot expect to depend upon such a miracle.

The name, Chanukah, also is translated as education, as well as renewal, rededication. Our source of strength, our ability to survive hostile empires and the other painful aspects of our history lies in the fact that we recognized that the source of our staying power is in our dedicated attachment to Torah .

The state of Israel is strengthening its programs of teaching Jewish heritage in its schools and the same thirst for a Torah connection to tradition is happily alive and growing there. We hope this is also occurring here.

Rabbi Israel of Chortikov asked why the miracle of Chanukah is not chronicled in its own scroll, as with Purim. His response was that the war our ancestors were forced to wage continues in various ways today. The struggle doesn't end and it will not be canonized in a megillah until we are victorious.

The candles and their meaning are our powerful weapons. Our responsibility is to strengthen the miracle, showing that it not only happened there and then, but it continues with us.

Rabbi Fine is the spiritual leader at Agudath Israel Congregation in Ottawa.

On guard for Israel

Guest Voices

Listen in on any conversation between friends or acquaintances who happen to be parents and you will likely hear the discussion turn to the activities of the children.

If the children are young, the talk is about schools, swim classes, soccer leagues, dance studios or gymnastics camp. When the children are older, it turns to part-time jobs, career choices and out-of-town universities.

I have participated in many such conversations over the years, but now, they take an unusual turn. It goes something like this:

"How are the kids? What's David up to these days?"

"He's doing great. He's in his second year at McGill and loves it. He's sharing an apartment with friends. And your kids? What's Elliott doing?"

"Elliott is in Israel."

"That's great. Is he at Hebrew U, or at a yeshivah?"

"He's in the army."

A moment of stunned silence. Nobody is expecting this answer.

As Canadian Jewish parents, we plan for our children's eduction and future, but those plans don't include seeing our children in army fatigues, carrying weapons, standing on guard for the Jewish State. But our children have their own ideas.

In Elliott's case, his own ideas came to him very early and very strongly. Within his first few years of school, he had decided that Israel was the place to be for the Jewish people and he began to plan for his future there. When he was 10, he would "work out" in the basement, declaring that he wanted to be in good shape when it was his time to go into the Israeli army.

Did I believe then that he would eventually go through with his plan? Probably not.

Now it has come to pass. Elliott is serving in an artillery unit, stationed in the north of Israel. My feelings are ambivalent. On the one hand, I am very proud of him, knowing that he is acting out of deep conviction and values that I share. On the other hand, I am concerned for his safety and feel that he has placed himself in avoidable danger.

I listen to news from Israel in a different way now – I take it personally. The Syrians are moving troops around on the Golan Heights? How dare they pick this time to do it, when Elliott is stationed at that border!

Phone calls are our chief method of keeping in touch and they are the highlight of the week. (The phone bills are the shock of the month!) Elliott manages to phone during a few minutes break from guard duty or on his occasional days off. He describes his experiences in vivid detail – the physical grind of basic training (Did those basement work-outs really help?), the "mind games" played by the officers as they try to instil some discipline into the new recruits (just like every Hollywood army movie ever made), the lighter moments when he entertains the troops with his imitations of Homer Simpson and Monty Python sketches.

The army has a term for soldiers like Elliott whose families are not living in Israel. The term is chayal boded which means "lone soldier." They recognize that these soldiers have special needs because they don't have their families close at hand to provide them with emotional support and physical comforts when they are off-duty.

I imagine the scene when a soldier comes home for a weekend exhausted and drained, to be greeted by a loving family, his favorite foods, a comfortable bed and laundry service. Elliott has had to cope without all this. He has also had to fend for himself with the army bureaucracy, without parents to weigh in on his behalf with their highly-placed army buddies. He has managed very well on his own, but I still feel the tug of regret that I couldn't "be there for him" like the Israeli mothers.

In one way, he has it easier than his Israeli counterparts. They have grown up in a culture in which the army is paramount and as a result, they feel pressure to achieve – to serve in elite units and to advance through the ranks quickly. Elliott has none of these pressures. Whatever his unit and rank, he can be proud of his choices and achievements.

Solomon's wisdom

By RACHAEL TURKIENICZ

We begin the Torah readings this month with Joseph's introduction into Pharaoh's court. Pharaoh has had two disturbing dreams and no one can find their true meanings. Joseph is called upon to interpret the dreams and because he does so he is granted an elevated position in the Egyptian government.

Subsequently his brothers come to Egypt to acquire food, since there is a famine in Canaan. After several tests, Joseph reveals himself to his brothers and the entire clan moves to Egypt.

Joseph is reunited with his brothers and his father. But has the family healed its wounds? Jacob and his sons do not live near Joseph, but are told by Joseph to settle in a region far away. Why is the family not melding into a solid unit once again? Why is the rift not closed?

The answer may be contained within the parallel Haftorah portion found in Kings I. This reading describes Solomon's first ruling upon becoming king. Two harlots approach Solomon, both claiming to be the mother of the same baby. The first woman claims that the other woman's infant died while asleep and that her baby was stolen and put in place of the dead infant. The second woman claims this is untrue and that the living infant is in fact her natural child.

There seems no way to determine who is the biological mother of the living infant and Solomon orders that a sword be brought. The king then decrees that the baby be cut in two, giving each woman half of the slaughtered infant. The natural mother cries out for mercy, begging Solomon to give the child to the other woman if need be, but to spare the infant's life. The second woman agrees with Solomon and claims that fairness would dictate that neither woman get the infant. Solomon immediately sees that the first woman is the true mother and delivers the child to her.

All Israel marvels at Solomon's wisdom and praises his judgment. One wonders at the awe expressed over Solomon's decision. Is it not obvious that a parent would rather give up a child than see it slain? Yet by combining this story with the Joseph story, a further dimension to Solomon's decision becomes clear.

Joseph is in fact the child split into two. Raised within a family unit with very specific beliefs, Joseph is torn from that unit and thrown into a surrounding with very different beliefs. Not only does Joseph enter the Egyptian culture, but Pharaoh even renames him, giving him an Egyptian name. Joseph cannot reunite with his family and live among them, for once the child is split it cannot be rejoiced into a healthy being.

As we find ourselves raising our children with Jewish values and education, we must be aware of providing bridges for them to exist in the world around them. If we do not teach them this skill, we ignore the wisdom of Solomon and in effect we split the child. They may attain the heights of Joseph, but they will forever live far from our midst.

Give Chanukah a drei

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

And now, in time for Chanukah, my Top Eight List of reasons to travel the Jewish Highway this Festival of Lights:

Reason No. 1 – The History

There are many excellent sites that look at the historical events and the miracles of Chanukah and look at them in more depth than you might remember. For a good perspective, try [http://www.jajz-ed.org.il/festivls/hanuka/index.html]. For several other thought-provoking essays about the holiday go to [http://www.ucalgary.ca/~elsegal/Shokel/Calendar_Index.html#Hanukkah].

Reason No. 2 – The Traditions

We all know about lighting the menorah and eating the traditional foods. But Chanukah is a holiday rich with other traditions as you can see at Virtual Jerusalem [http://www.jer1.co.il/education/education/ohr/special/chanukah/laws.htm] and at The Global Learning Network [http://www.torah.org/learning/yomtov/chanukah/]. Another comprehensive guide to the holiday is found at [gopher://gopher.chabad.org:70/00/guide/chanukah].

Reason No. 3 – The Menorah

The Menorah is one of the most famous symbols in Judaism. You can find an excellent history of the Menorah at [http://www.jer1.co.il/city_services/holidays/chanukah/menfile.htm] including an explanation of why the chanukiah lit on this holiday has nine branches while the Menorah in the Temple had seven.

There is a well-known debate between the scholars Hillel and Shammai over the Chanukah lights. Shammai suggested lighting eight lights on the first night, seven on the second and finishing with one light on the last night. Hillel proposed the more familiar one light on the first, two on the second, and so on. According to the explanation found at Kolel: A Centre for Liberal Jewish Learning's Chanukah site [http://www.cherniak.on.ca/kolel/], we have adopted Hillel's "optimistic" view of the world that every day our days are "growing in wisdom and light and beauty until at the end we shine with accumulated grace and experience."

Chanukah is unique among Jewish holidays in that there is the commandment to publicize the miracle. This won't surprise anyone who has been to a public square and has seen those gigantic chanukiot. So if you feel that your table-top menorah is just a bit too small, now you can own your own giant [http://deepthought.armory.com/~peterr/menorah.html]. At $650 US the nine-foot menorah is perfect for "malls, military installations and synagogues."

Reason No. 4 – The Dreidel

One of the best known symbols of the holiday is the dreidel or sevivon. You can find a brief history of this toy at [http://www.ort.org/ort/hanukkah/games.htm].

In Poker, Dreidel and Hannukah, Robin Treistman looks at the dreidel and asks: If Judaism traditionally frowns on gambling, "how is it that once a year, children pull out a funny, little, squarish top, engraved on four sides with Hebrew letters, and gamble?" You can find the answer at [http://www.wzo.org.il/encountr/dreidle.htm] Also, take a look at Ohr Somayach's The Secret of the Dreidel at [http://www.jer1.co.il/education/education/ohr/special/chanukah/chan95.htm].

Although the Internet still can't help you make a dreidel out of clay, it can help you with one out of paper. If you click on [http://www.jewishpost.com/chanukah/pattern.html] you can download and print plans for a dreidel which you can cut out and play with.

Sure it can't match the excitement of betting on a dreidel against your friends, but if you're alone why not try JCN's Great Computerized Dreidel Game [http://www.jcn18.com/spin-ns.htm]. Press a button, spin against the computer and if your luck isn't great, no-one will know.

In my next column, I'll share the remaining four reasons.

Have a very Happy Chanukah!

CD-ROM developed to help teach the Holocaust

By RON CSILLAG
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO – In the inevitable clash between the old and new, great things happen sometimes, as when the wizardry of CD-ROM technology is used to teach the Holocaust.

An official of Yad Vashem (the "new" Yad Vashem, she called it) was in town recently to take the wraps off the first of four extra-ordinary CD-ROMs that will be used to teach the Holocaust to the next generation.

Developed with donations from Toronto philanthropist Leslie Dan, the CDs will allow students to learn about virtually any aspect of the Holocaust and its aftermath with the click of a mouse.

The discs will employ full color graphics, survivors' real-voice testimonies, time-lines, speeches and an array of interactive tools that will allow computer users to get a unique view of the period.

Simcha Salach, director of the Yad Vashem Foundation, unveiled the first of the four devices during Holocaust Education Week. Titled Return to Life, it focuses on the story of survivors who emerged from the devastation of Europe. Discussions include life in the DP camps and the second struggle for life Jews had to wage in their often dangerous route to Palestine.

Developers of the CD scanned thousands of photographs, documents and artifacts, and interviewed dozens of survivors and scholars. The research took two years.

Computer buffs will be pleased with the programs. The discs have navigators allowing users to go where they please, at their own rate. Click on "camps," and a full complement is screened, from Auschwitz to Treblinka, with accompanying photographs, statistics and descriptions of daily life. Similarly, a click on "maps" produces full or partial maps of Europe, with cities and concentration camps in full view.

The disc is billed as an hour long, but a user can easily wander for hours more, listening to witnesses, reading newspapers produced in the post-war DP camps, even hearing music of the period. Buyers will be able to choose between discs in Hebrew, English and other languages.

The three other discs will be produced over the next three years. Each will retail for $50 (US) and come with a teacher's manual.

The discs are part of Yad Vashem's ongoing efforts to reach younger people, Salach told The CJN.

Simcha Salach

"We knew that 50 years worth of information had to be updated or else we might see a whole generation drifting away from the Holocaust," she said. The discs stress the positive aspects of survival and do not dwell on the grisly, Salach explained.

They're also the first comprehensive, interactive approach to Holocaust education and part of Yad Vashem's education packages, including teacher training, she said, adding that young people, who seem natural computer users, will be drawn to the discs, especially for their splashy colors and graphics.

The first disc will be available through the Canadian Society for Yad Vashem beginning in January. For details, call 905-660-6028.

Biography examines pioneering U.S. rabbi

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A pioneering Miami Beach Reform rabbi, credited with bringing Israeli and North American Jews closer together, is the subject of a biography by Canadian scholar Prof. Henry A. Green.

Hundreds of Canadian Jewish tourists attended sermons by the late Rabbi Leon Kronish, founding rabbi of Temple Beth Sholom, when Miami Beach was a popular locale for Canadians who are now wintering further north in Florida. They used to walk to the Temple from hotels on the beach.

Titled Gesher Vakesher, Bridges and Bonds, Green's biography is a compelling account of the rabbi who was in the vanguard of the movement by Reform back to traditional liturgy.

"He was wearing a tallit and kippah back in the 1940s," Green told The CJN.

Rabbi Kronish was a central figure in the rise of Miami Beach as the third most important centre of Jewish life in the United States.

"He Israelized North America," Green said. "He led the way for Reform rabbis to spend a year in Israel before receiving their smichah (ordination); he founded Reform kibbutzim and developed the system of contributions to Israel Bonds through tabs at High Holy Day services."

Max Kronish, the rabbi's father, came to Toronto in 1913 from Ukraine and worked in the garment trade. A few years later, he moved to New York where the rabbi was born in 1917.

The author is the son of Sidney and Sarah Green of Ottawa and in his book, he credits his upbringing in an Orthodox family very much involved in communal activities as the inspiration for his career. In fact, he dedicates the book to his parents. His grandmother, Dora Lithwick, was the founder of Hillel Home for the Aged in Ottawa.

The author, who lives in Florida with his wife, Elizabeth, and three children, Jordan, Trevor and Fiona, has one sister, Arlene, of Denver, and two brothers in Toronto, Melvyn and Kalman

Youthful idealism fueled Holocaust resistance: expert

By RON CSILLAG
CJN Staff Reporter

Ariel Hurwitz

TORONTO – It was young people – fueled by youthful idealism, courage and energy – who played key roles in Jewish resistance during the Holocaust, says an Israeli expert on the period.

In fact, most of the better-known heroes of Jewish resistance were members of youth groups that were popular in Eastern Europe, says Ariel Hurwitz, who was in town last month for a series of speaking engagements, including at Holocaust Education Week.

There was more resistance from Jews than most people know, Hurwitz said, and its leaders were sometimes barely out of their teens.

"Resistance was not only someone who took up arms. Resistance also took the form of religious observance when it was punishable by death. The Jewish underground put out newspapers, currency and operated schools. Those were forms of resistance," said Hurwitz, a professor of Jewish history and Holocaust studies in Tel Aviv, brought here by the Canadian Friends of Givat Haviva.

Jewish youth groups played important roles in shaping their members, who became leaders in resisting the Nazis, he explained.

While these groups were all based on scouting and intended to prepare Jewish youngsters for emigration to Palestine, they ended up providing many wartime resistance leaders, Hurwitz told The CJN in an interview.

Perhaps it was the idealism inculcated by groups like Habonim Dror, Hashomer Hatzair, Bétar and B'nei Akiva that resulted in so many young partisans and resistance fighters, he said.

Hurwitz believes young people rose to positions of power because they had no spouses and children to worry about, while their parents were still young enough to care for themselves.

Well-known resistance fighters like Roza Robota, who spearheaded the 1944 Auschwitz revolt, and Mordechai Anilevich, who led the Warsaw Ghetto uprising, were both leaders in Hashomer Hatzair, Hurwitz's research has shown.

At their peak, Jewish and Zionist youth movements had 100,000 members in Poland alone, all preparing for aliyah.

Hurwitz's research has led him to discover letters, diary entries and other evidence of the "idealism" with which young people fought back against the Nazis. "The Warsaw Ghetto uprising began with a few kids, one broken pistol and lasted a month," he said.

While in Toronto, Hurwitz addressed two high school assemblies, and said he finds that today's teens identify with the wartime underground.

"It's probably because they both questioned the status quo."

Hurwitz uses that affinity to teach the Holocaust to young people at Moreshet, a leading Israeli educational program and centre for documenting Jewish resistance during the war. The program is among the many affiliated with Givat Haviva, an award-winning institute that promotes religious pluralism and tolerance.

CJC helps in small communities

TORONTO – Have Jewish education, will travel could be an appropriate slogan for Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC), Ontario region's Family Outreach Project for Jewish families living in small communities in the province.

The project encourages joint participation by parents and children (up to bar/bat mitzvah age) in a Jewish education in a program prepared and delivered by CJC staff, using personal visits, weekly home-study packages and family retreats. The project's aim is to help parents transmit Jewish values to their children and increase their knowledge of Jewish heritage and traditions.

"Presenting Judaism in a positive fashion within the framework of the family unit strengthens not only the children's links to Judaism, but the parents' links as well," said Jennifer Turack, CJC Ontario region director of Community Services and Youth Activities.

"By having retreats and various programs, the unit becomes involved in a sense of Jewish community which provides a larger framework for Jewish learning and value dissemination."

Up to three times a year, professional staff from CJC come to run programs in a given area, Turack said. Once a year, a family Shabbat retreat is held that includes all the families in the project. The annual fee per family is $100.

The project, which has been operating for eight years, is supported by the L.A. Pincus Jewish Education Fund for the Diaspora, she said. The CJC's Community Services and Youth Activities Department delivers programs and services to over 30 small communities in Ontario from James Bay to the Niagara Peninsula.

Project coordinator Leanne Rosen, a recent graduate of the University of Guelph has specialized in family and social relations.

The weekly home study packages contain information with suggested Shabbat activities for Friday night and arts and crafts projects to be done during the week, Rosen said. The Shabbat material includes the sedrah story to read, with discussion topics and questions for the family, and Shabbat prayers.

To enrol in the program, or for additional information, contact Rosen by mail at Canadian Jewish Congress, 4600 Bathurst St. North York M2R 3V2, by phone at 416-635-2883, ext. 139, by fax at 416-635-1408

UJA CAMPAIGN CONTINUES TO CLIMB

It may feel like winter, but UJA Federation's campaign thermometer keeps rising higher. A recent flurry of telethons and over 1,200 gifts from new contributors have already propelled the campaign beyond $31 million.

To date, 23,000 donors have made their commitment to community, but, as Campaign Chairman David Goldstein says, "we can't rest until we've reached everyone."

The downtown Jewish community pitched in, holding its own telethon at the Bloor JCC. "It was great to see so much community spirit," said Karen Chisvin, President of the Downtown Jewish Community Council. "We hope this will become a regular site for future telethons."

David Wintre, who co-chaired the downtown phone fest with Rosanne Ain, said the telethons were a "great way for the downtown Jewish community to feel more connected with UJA Federation."

More than 50 University students recently put their ears to the task at UJA Federation's first student telethon. "Everyone had a great time making calls," said U of T's Ilan Barda, who helped recruit campaigners. "Faces lit up when they received pledges."

Although, second year York University student Stacey Wintre has been involved with UJA Federation for years, she was "very impressed to see so many new faces. Hopefully they will continue to be regular donors."

A special series of Chanukah telethons runs from Sunday, December 8 to December 11. Campaigners are invited to bring their families along for a fun filled day including latkes, entertainment, games and prizes.

"We are now entering a crucial phase of campaign," noted Goldstein. "Intensifying our efforts to reach everyone possible will mean the difference between a good campaign and a great one."

UJA Federation delivers the light

A platoon of volunteers is spreading out across the city to perform a mission like no other. Their objective is bringing the celebration of Chanukah to the sick, the elderly and those disconnected from the Jewish community.

Armed with latkes, candles, menorahs and dreidels, 50 wellwishers from Jewish Family and Child Service's Chaplaincy program, funded by UJA Federation, have begun visiting nearly 1,000 Jews in 33 hospitals, 45 nursing homes and 24 provincial correctional facilities.

"No Jew, no matter where he or she is, should be alone during the holidays," says Rabbi Ronald Weiss, Director of Chaplaincy Services. Weiss, who personally visits patients at the Queen Street Mental Health Centre, the Clark Institute, and the Whitby Mental Health Centre, says for many "it's the only visit they'll get this time of year."

Carl Rees, who has been sharing Chanukah with residents of Cummer Lodge for the past 15 years, says he looks forward to the visits as much as the residents do. On December 10, Rees along with other volunteers will hold a Chanukah party in the Lodge's lobby complete with food, entertainment and decorations.

"We bring them a feeling of community spirit," explains Rees. "It helps alleviate the loneliness and isolation some of the residents experience."

Chanukah content during volunteer visits may include entertainment, candle-lighting ceremonies and storytelling.

"It depends on the audience," explains Weiss. "Sometimes hearing a tune or smelling warm latkes evokes reaction. It's an indication that they know it's Chanukah."

Rabbi Ronald Weiss raises the menorah for all to see at Queen Street Mental Health Centre.

Diplomatic reception

Yosi Kaspi, Senior Vice-President, Bank Hapoalim, greets Monica Berger, wife of David Berger, Canada's ambassador to Israel (middle). Bank Hapoalim sponsored a reception at the Berger home for participants of UJA Federation's Arts & Entertainment mission and leading personalities in Israel's A&E industry.

Festive mood at Major Gifts Gala

UJA Federation recently saluted close to 400 of the community's most significant supporters. The Major Gifts and Atarah evening, sponsored by the Royal Bank's Business Banking Division featured a keynote address from Neal Sher, formerly responsible for prosecuting war criminals in the United States and a musical tribute to Yiddish favorites, performed by Theresa Tova.

Karen and Paul Morton and Joanne and Miles Nadal co-chaired the event.

Photographer Stephen Epstein captured some of the faces from the campaign celebration.

DUSHANSKY SETS SIZEABLE GOALS

The man hired to oversee Israel's first UJA-style fundraising campaign is very optimistic about the pioneering project.

"Once Israelis learn where the money goes," said Joe Dushansky, Executive Director of The Israel Campaign, "they will lend their support. Israelis are very generous."

The Israel Campaign will back the Jewish Agency, funded primarily by Federations around the world. The Agency, which rescues Jews in dangerous regions and finances crucial social and educational projects, is working its way out of severe financial problems caused by rising immigrant absorption costs and funding decreases.

Dushansky considers the Israel Campaign and Toronto's UJA Federation campaign as complementary. He foresees a genuine partnership to meet Jewish needs wherever they may be.

The former Deputy Director General of the Diaspora Museum, says the success of the campaign rests primarily on educating Israelis about what the Jewish Agency does. "Most Israelis don't have a clue that many of their social institutions, such as community centres and educational facilities, are partially funded by the Jewish Agency," he observed.

Joe Dushansky

According to Dushansky, the potential to raise $30 - $50 million in 5 years is not unrealistic. "In 1995 Israelis donated $300 million dollars to charities," he pointed out.

YOUNGSTERS EMBRACE TZEDAKAH

UJA Federation's Tzedakah All Star program is growing just in time for Chanukah.

Since the project's launch last year, more than 800 gifts have been donated by students to needy children across the Greater Toronto Area. During the Chanukah holiday, even more gifts are expected to arrive.

The program, initiated by Elizabeth Erlich, the only one of its kind in North America, encourages children to donate unwrapped holiday or birthday gifts. They're distributed by Jewish Family and Child Service to children in need.

Children of all ages are depositing presents into special Tzedakah All Star collection boxes now located in 8 schools across the city.

Parent volunteers like Lisa Galet Victor pick up the donated items every Monday and deliver them to JF&CS. "It's an amazing project because kids can practice tzedakah at a level they can relate to," says Victor.

Program chair Karen Amato thinks the gift giving program is "a wonderful opportunity for children to become aware of how they can help others in the community." Karen's own daughter Lauren recently joined the expanding Tzedakah All Star team by donating some of the gifts she received on her 7th birthday.

Tzedakah All Star collection boxes are located at Bialik Hebrew Day School, United Synagogue Day School branches on Bathurst Street, Bayview Avenue and in Richmond Hill, Associated Hebrew School branches on Finch Avenue, Leslie Street and Atkinson Road in Thornhill and Netivot Hatorah.

Ilana and Aviva Erlich demonstrate the Tzedakah All-Star technique.

Community Partners

Proud to volunteer

Although Norma Lowe Klein has been heavily involved with UJA Federation for many years, she's looking forward to sharing her commitment with someone else in the house.

Klein, recently married, is excited about getting her husband Howard involved as a volunteer in the Jewish community and hopes that someday the two can set an example for their children. "My husband is very proud of my work at UJA Federation," says Klein, "and now he wants to be a part of it to."

"We're planning to go on a mission to Israel," she adds. "It will be a great way for us to learn about all the projects supported by UJA Federation."

As a teenager in Winnipeg, Norma spent much of her time volunteering with United Synagogue Youth, both at the regional and national level. "Synagogue was a big part of my life," explains Klein, who returned to Winnipeg for her marriage ceremony last summer.

Soon after Klein, a dental hygienist, moved to Toronto in 1986, her desire for Jewish community involvement brought her to UJA Federation. She co-chaired the Dental Hygienists Division for 4 years, came out to campaign on Super Sundays and has recently become a greeter for the Shalom Toronto program, sponsored by Jewish Women's Federation.

Norma Lowe Klein

"I was very impressed that someone made the effort to educate me about Toronto's Jewish community when I arrived," she recalls.

Klein's volunteerism also took her to the Reena Foundation's education committee and the Bernard Betel Centre.

"I feel pride when I help others and at the same time I express my Jewish identity," she says.

YOU CAN MAKE MIRACLES HAPPEN ON THIS HOLIDAY OF MIRACLES

Just like a drop of oil brought light to the Jewish people in the days of the Maccabees, a new gift to UJA will help light the way for Jews in need today.

Israeli rabbi urges tolerance among Jews

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO – Rabbi Naftali Rothenberg has a similar message for both his Orthodox colleagues and liberal Jewish organizations such as the New Israel Fund (NIF), which brought him to Toronto last week as part of an international NIF speaking tour.

The 47-year-old spiritual leader of the Jerusalem suburb of Har Adar, who is also a senior research fellow at Jerusalem's Van Leer Institute, tells liberal-minded Jews they "have to find a way to engage [their] values of tolerance and democracy to the agenda of the Torah world and of traditional religious society in Israel."

At the same time, he urges his colleagues in Israel's rabbinic establishment to "do everything to create dialogue," he said in an interview.

At the Van Leer Institute, a think tank which deals with Jewish and non-Jewish issues, the Israeli-born Orthodox rabbi chairs the Forum on Jewish Thought and Identity.

In Toronto, his only Canadian stop, the rabbi participated in a panel discussion at Beth Tzedec Congregation on The Challenge of Tolerance: Prospects for Religious Pluralism in Israel, together with Rabbi Baruch Frydman-Kohl of Beth Tzedec, Rabbi Dow Marmur of Holy Blossom Temple and Orthodox scholar Rachael Turkienicz.

Religious pluralism, per se, is not an issue on the Israeli agenda, Rabbi Rothenberg told The CJN. The issue of whether Conservative and Reform rabbis can be empowered to perform marriages, for example, will likely be resolved as a byproduct of the resolution to a more pressing issue, that of the increasing number of non-Jewish immigrants from the former Soviet Union who are unable to marry in Israel.

If civil marriage is introduced in Israel as a solution to the latter problem – and there are many "ifs," said Rabbi Rothenberg, weighing his words carefully – he believes people who want a Conservative or Reform wedding will opt for a local civil marriage and invite the rabbi of their choice to perform a religious ceremony.

Rabbi Naftali Rothenberg

Reform and Conservative rabbis can officiate at weddings in Israel now, but the couples have to go out of the country for a civil wedding that will be recognized in Israel, he explained.

The rabbi has published numerous articles on education, Halachah and Jewish philosophy.

In July, 1995, he spoke out in a Jerusalem Post column against the "crass exploitation of halachic and pseudo-halachic concepts for political ends by Diaspora and Israeli rabbis."

A rabbinic ruling regarding obedience of soldiers on issues of security was an attempt to influence the government, Rabbi Rothenberg believes. It was "liable to make a small number of people feel justified in breaking the law by committing terrible actions that could lead to killing and destruction," he predicted.

The rabbi, who served in a combat unit of the Hesder program for religious soldiers, declines to commit himself publicly to a political stand. He has limited himself to commenting only on those political issues involving morals or values, he said.

"I'm usually against the politicians on all the sides for moral issues," he joked wryly.

CJC tables motion on non-Orthodox conversions

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO – A motion to urge the Knesset to avoid prohibiting non-Orthodox conversions did not pass at a Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) national executive meeting recently.

Despite the fact that the motion was presented at the request of the top CJC officers, who described any such action by the Knesset as "divisive," it was tabled by the executive by a large majority.

"I feel uncomfortable putting this to a vote with not one of the national officers here to speak on it," said national chair Renee Bellas, Vancouver.

She explained that the motion had come forward from a national officers' meeting earlier in the day "from Rabbi Gunther Plaut via Irving Abella, both former CJC presidents," who could not attend the executive meeting. CJC president Goldie Hershon was out of the country and other top officers were not present.

The motion at the national officers' meeting engendered a lengthy debate and was not passed unanimously, said Hal Joffe, Calgary. Its supporters felt that disallowing non-Orthodox conversions would "impact" on the Diaspora and raise anew the controversy over "Who is a Jew?" while opponents said it would affect only conversions in Israel, Joffe said.

Several delegates objected to the motion's being presented to the executive without notice.

The Knesset is expected to take action in about a week, said David Rotenberg, Toronto, who supported the tabling of the motion.

In the wake of the the Matzahgate affair over labelling of kosher products in Quebec and following the resignation of Lt.-Gov. Jean-Louis Roux, the topic of CJC relations with B'nai Brith Canada (BBC) was also discussed.

Quebec region chair, Reisa Teitelbaum, told the executive that CJC has to live with BBC, despite their differences.

She said Hershon talked to BBC leaders after the Montreal difficulties.

"We can get along and do what's best, and not fight with each other," Teitelbaum said.

BBC claims it is parallel to the CJC in representing views of the Canadian Jewish community, she said. "I don't agree, I say BBC represents its own membership. But the problem has been around for 25 years and it won't go away in 25 years."

One of the distressing aftermaths of the Roux resignation was that newspaper editorials blamed the CJC for causing it, when in fact, the CJC had not asked him to resign, Teitebaum said.

On relations with still another group, the executive wants to improve the CJC's ties with the Canada-Israel Committee (CIC) and passed a resolution to this effect.

"The CIC is responsible for lobbying in Ottawa on Israel matters, while the CJC handles relations with non-governmental organizations, the Arab and ethnocultural groups," said CJC treasurer, Zev Claman, Montreal. "We want a stronger partnership without duplication, to minimize costs."

The only delegate to abstain on this resolution was Larry A. Riterman, Atlantic Jewish Council, Halifax, who declared: "You can lobby all you want, but if the press turns up the heat in the kitchen, it's of no use. An example is the Toronto Star focusing on funds going beyond the Green Line."

The CJC relationship with Peace Now, one of its contituent members, was yet another subject of contention. A motion by Dr. Naim Dallal, Toronto, to ask Peace Now to abide by CJC policy and not publicly criticize Israeli government actions was tabled by about a two to one margin. Some delegates again objected to the motion's being presented without notice.

"Our statement was not sent to the newspapers," said Dr. Frank Guttman, Montreal, national Peace Now co-president, in defence of their actions.

An effort to direct more money and services to small communities by forming a new partnership between the CJC, the Council of Jewish Federations, the United Israel Appeal and other organizations was supported. Because of cuts to the CJC budget, small communities are not getting as much service, said Bellas.

Kalejs case nears end

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The evidence is in and the case involving alleged Nazi war criminal Konrads Kalejs is entering the home stretch.

Defence counsel and federal prosecutors wrapped up their cases last week and adjudicator Anthony Iozzo has allocated five days beginning on Jan. 20 for oral submissions. Lawyers for both sides will address legal issues and the evidence at that time.

Kalejs, an Australian citizen visiting Canada, is alleged to have been involved in war crimes as a senior lieutenant in the Arajs Kommando in wartime Latvia. Federal authorities are seeking a removal order against him based on his alleged involvement in war crimes and because, they argue, he is not a genuine visitor to Canada.

A longtime resident of the United States, Kalejs was ordered out of that country after various courts found he participated in war crimes. He later moved to Canada and he resides in a North York condominium that has a substantial number of Jewish residents, including Holocaust survivors.

Justice Department lawyer Donald MacIntosh said he and colleague Bonnie Boucher have submitted a 119-page document outlining legal arguments in the case and have highlighted numerous inconsistencies in Kalejs' testimony, suggesting he is not a credible witness. MacIntosh said he doesn't expect a decision in the case perhaps until next April.

Pharmacy fraternity marks 70th year

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — The Rokeah chapter of Rho Pi Phi Pharmacy Fraternity recently celebrated its 70th anniversary at a dinner and dance at the Bayview Golf and Country Club.

More than 120 fratters, their spouses and spouses of fratters who have died attended the gala evening. The program included a tribute to the founding members and a candle lighting ceremony conducted by vice-chancellors Philip Eisner, Harry Kraft and Seymour Rosenblatt.

The Rokeah Pharmacy Club was founded in 1925 by the late Mooney Mirochnik, who opened a drug store in 1914 on Dundas Street West at Palmerston Avenue. The club's founders, who included Izzie Rothbart, Wilf Isaacson, Moe Haberman and Sam Rosenthal, recognized that Jewish pharmacists faced antagonism from their non-Jewish competitors and professional limitations were being placed on them.

By forming a group, the Jewish pharmacists would be able to speak with one voice. One of the objectives of the Rokeah Club was to develop a spirit of fellowship and responsibility for one another.

In 1926, Rho Pi Phi was formed as a social group for Jewish pharmacists. In 1964, the two groups merged to become Rokeah chapter of Rho Pi Phi International, which has 38 chapters in the United States and Puerto Rico.

Over the years, Rokeah chapter grew, gained prestige and broadened the scope of its activities to include service to the community and communal responsibility. The group established pharmacy scholarships and lent its support to the United Jewish Appeal, State of Israel Bonds, the Hospital for Sick Children, Hebrew University, the Baycrest Centre, Ezra-Kadima Hebrew School, the Canadian Cancer Society, and other charitable organizations.

In time, Rokeah developed strong links with non-Jewish pharmacists and many Rokeah leaders served with distinction in non-sectarian pharmaceutical associations.

Joe Litchen, a past chancellor of Rokeah, who served as master of ceremonies, welcomed dean emeritus Norman Hughes and dean Don Perrier of the Ontario College of Pharmacists. Litchen introduced Ralph Goldsman, a past chancellor and chaplain who presented the fraternity prayer, and Maxwell Joel, the chancellor, who reviewed the past 40 years. Entertainment was provided by singer Marty Rose.

"The evening had many special and beautiful memories." said Litchen. "Many of us fratters received our basic training in organizational work in Rho Pi Phi and we earned respect in all phases of pharmacy, whether it was in retail, hospital, education or manufacturing."

Mellen book probes into literary couple's psyches

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

TORONTO— From the moment Lillian Hellman met Dashiell Hammett in a Manhattan nightclub in 1930 until his death in 1961, she was "not only his best friend but also his only friend," yet so thoroughly did she mythologize their relationship, and so widespread was her reputation for lying, that Gore Vidal once wickedly pondered: "Did anyone ever actually see them together?"

Even more than a decade after Hellman's death in 1984, myths, contradictions and paradoxes cloud our perceptions of this pre-eminent American literary duo: the hard-drinking Hammett, master of the hard-boiled style evidenced in such detective novels as The Maltese Falcon (1930), The Glass Key (1931) and The Thin Man (1934); Hellman, his devoted protege, who crafted celebrated plays like The Children's Hour (1934), The Little Foxes (1939), Watch On The Rhine (1941) and Toys In The Attic (1960).

Joan Mellen, New York-based author of the fascinating new dual biography Hellman and Hammett: The Legendary Passion of Lillian Hellman and Dashiell Hammett (HarperCollins, $45), noted that Hellman had not written anything substantial before meeting Hammett, and that he stopped writing altogether shortly after they met.

Speaking at the recent Harbourfront International Author's Festival here, Mellen disputed the accusation made by some critics that Hellman drained what was left of Hammett's talent. Hammett, "in a singular act of generosity," gave Hellman the plot for The Children's Hour, her first big success, and patiently taught her his style of "bare-boned lucidity," Mellen observed.

In choosing a writing career and a life with Hammett, whom she never married, Hellman entered into a "Faustian bargain" that would deprive her of the children she wanted so dearly, Mellen said. In one of her biggest lies, Hellman "invented a child born to her via a Yugoslav lover. She greatly wanted children and felt she could not be complete without them. As John Hersey said at her funeral, she remained an unfinished woman."

An Unfinished Woman, of course, is the title of one of Hellman's supposedly autobiographical works; the others are Pentimento and Scoundrel Time. Although each was a bestseller, each has been strongly criticized as containing more fancy than fact. For example, in the chapter "Julia" in Pentimento, which later became a movie starring Jane Fonda, Hellman told the story of how she carried money into Nazi Germany for a socialist-activist friend.

Hellman fled to Europe

"In truth, Lillian Hellman had never met the character based on Julia," Mellen said. "The story belonged to somebody else, Muriel Gardiner."

It is also apparently untrue that Hellman courageously withstood the bullying political committees of the Joseph McCarthy era. In her memoirs, Hellman described hocking her jewelry to pay the $10,000 bail after Hammett was jailed for his alleged Red associations. In truth, Mellen found that Hellman did not pay the bail, and was so afraid to visit Hammett in jail that she went to Europe instead. "Hammett was terribly hurt, but he later forgave her."

Hellman greatly embroidered the truth about herself but never told lies that caused serious harm or suffering to others, Mellen concluded.

"Hellman never denied that she lied. Her view was that most people did it and it was a means of survival."

One of Hellman's greatest foes was not Joseph McCarthy but the American writer Mary McCarthy, who charged on a national TV talk show that "every word she writes is a lie, including 'and' and 'the.'"

Hellman responded with a lawsuit that forced McCarthy to recant; the incident is still famous in New York literary circles. "Lillian was so angry she vowed to break Mary McCarthy, and almost did just that," Mellen said.

Richly researched and with an astonishing level of detail, the book's 572 pages probe much deeper than any previous bio into the psyches of this hard-living literary couple who were far more faithful to their craft than to each other.

"Hammett's achievement lives on," Mellen said, "and Hellman is still remembered as a literary character and as an example of someone who lived a literary life to the fullest."

You've Arranged Your Cemetery Plot. Now What?

The most expensive part of dying is normally the funeral, not the plot. Most people end up spending thousands of dollars, unnecessarily, at a time when they are most vulnerable.

Cohen biography provides many critical insights

Jewish authors

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to the CJN

TORONTO — It seems so long ago that Leonard Cohen, the gravelly-voiced songwriter-poet from Westmount, first won international acclaim with compelling songs like Suzanne and So Long, Marianne, at once deeply romantic and mystical.

With 10 books of poetry, two novels and a dozen albums to his credit, and three tribute albums of his songs in record stores, the Cohen legend has not had a chance to tarnish: it still gleams. Forever the golden boy of Canadian poets, and the spiritual son or younger brother to Montreal poets such as Irving Layton, Cohen, remains one of the most expressive and enigmatic figures in Canadian letters, even as he remains a heart-throb to female fans around the world.

Now a new biography, Various Positions: A Life of Leonard Cohen (Random House, $29.95) tries to unite the reality with the myth, according to its author, Ira Nadel, a book critic for CBC radio in Vancouver.

"I was more interested in trying to understand: How does a Canadian from Westmount generate this mystique about himself as an artist?" Nadel explained recently. "How does a Canadian folksinger develop an international following? Who is this guy? Why do women get bleary-eyed when they meet him? That's what I wanted to know."

To find out, Nadel spent three years in research, conducted hundreds of interviews and traveled to Montreal, New York, Nashville, and Hydra, the Greek island where Cohen lived and wrote for many years. He also visited Cohen at his present home in Los Angeles, where he met – and won the approval of – his trusted zen master, Roshi.

Cohen,62, invited Nadel to L.A. after reading an article Nadel had written about him; they hit it off, and the biography ensued. Although Cohen provided full access to his unpublished papers, this isn't an "authorized" biography: he prefers the phrase "benignly tolerated."

Simply put, Various Positions provides a vital context for understanding Cohen's ouevre by presenting his life story with an astonishingly rich level of detail.

Cohen rubbed shoulders with Jack Kerouac, Allen Ginsberg and other beat poets in New York in the 1950s. A decade later he was hanging out with Bob Dylan, Phil Ochs, Joan Baez, Joni Mitchell, even Janis Joplin,whom he met once.

A famous ladies' man, Cohen's relations with women are explored in depth, from his longtime lovers Suzanne and Marianne to less significant partners such as the woman who knocked at his hotel room one night wearing only aluminum foil.

The book also explores Cohen's recurrent depressions, his experimentation with drugs, and his steadfast attachment to Judaism – his grandfather was an eminent Montreal rabbi – even as he delved into zen buddhism.

"Leonard sees no conflict in this," Nadel explains. "They do not cancel themselves out. That's what the title means: it's possible to take various positions in life. Leonard is a Jew first and foremost, that's very important. There's absolutely no conflict for him in being Jewish and being a follower of zen practices. Zen for Leonard is not a religion, it's a training in self-reform and self- discovery."

Leonard Cohen (left) with author Ira Nadel.

According to Nadel, Cohen's first two books (Let Us Compare Mythologies, 1956, and The Spice-Box of Earth, 1961) were intensely romantic, while the next two (Flowers for Hitler, 1964, and Parasites of Heaven, 1966) "represent a collision with history." With his next works – The Energy of Slaves (1972), Death of A Lady's Man (1978) and Book of Mercy (1984), Cohen "begins to look more inward, and increasingly becomes more spiritual. So you could think of Cohen's progression as the spiritual replacing the lyrical," Nadel says.

However, while Various Positions contains many valuable critical insights, its author points out that it is a biography, not a critical study. "If this book achieves anything, it will provide a grasp of the life of Leonard Cohen. One hopes it will inspire people to listen to the songs and read the poems and books again."

Parchment launched at Jewish Book Fair

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — "In spite of the fact I knew only too well that my zaidy, Shloime Kuperblum, had perished in the holocaust, I nevertheless saw him one late afternoon on a Toronto street in the summer of 1956."

This is the opening sentence of author-filmmaker Jack Kuper's brief memoir An Angel On Elm Street. It also served, during the recent Jewish Book Fair, as the opening sentence at the launch of Parchment, the fifth annual journal of contemporary Canadian Jewish writing, when Kuper read the tale before an audience of more than 100 people.

Novelist Morley Torgov, who "moonlights" as a Bay Street lawyer, read a section of his new short story The War to End All Wars, involving a feud between two Jewish merchants in a northern Ontario town; the two had fought on opposite sides in World War I. The story, he said, is the basis for a forthcoming novel of the same name.

"I feel greatly honored to be part of this," he said, holding up the new issue of Parchment. "As I read piece after piece, I say to myself, 'I wish I could write like that person.'"

Other readers included Lila Julius, who recited her short memoir Driving Through Hebron, and Gabriella Goliger, who recited her short story Maladies of the Inner Ear. Parchment poetry editor Malca Litovitz read the poem Mother by the absent Miriam Schneid-Ofseyer. All the pieces and many more are included in the latest Parchment, available for $12 (two issues, $20) from Jewish bookstores or from the Centre for Jewish Studies, Vanier 260, York University, 4700 Keele St., North York, Ont., M3J 1P3.

Jerusalem, a new anthology of Jewish Canadian poetry edited by Seymour Mayne and B. Glen Rotchin (Vehicule Press, Montreal, $13.95), was also launched at the event. Published to commemorate Jerusalem 3000, the volume contains works by 19 contributors, both deceased and extant, including Leonard Cohen, Marvyne Jenoff, A.M. Klein, Shel Krakofsky, Irving Layton, Carl Rose, Kenneth Sherman and Miriam Waddington.

Jewish poets in Canada tend to add a Canadian dimension to their impressions of Jerusalem, Rotchin said, as he introduced his reading of two "snow poems" from the anthology: Winter Evening On Zion by the late Hyman Edelstein, and Rotchin's own Snowfall in Jerusalem.

Clearly, many of the writers were buoyed by the sudden attention associated with reading their works in public. Many stayed behind, chatting animatedly, long after the last reading was performed.

"Writers work a long time in obscurity," Goliger, an Ottawa writer, explained. "It's a special kind of thrill to read before a live audience."

"This event shows the enormous variety and vitality of Jewish writing in Canada today," said Seymour Mayne, an Ottawa English professor who has been called the dean of Jewish poets in Canada. "Both in Parchment and in Jerusalem, you see the continuous thread in Jewish Canadian writing, which you won't see in American Jewish writing: a positive identification with Israel.

"In Canada, Jewish writers are not afraid to identify with Israel and to affirm all that is positive in being Jewish, culturally and religiously. They're not shy about expressing their strong sense of identity in the Canadian mosaic. Americans, on the other hand, are more self-involved: they're caught up in American culture, which involves the gratification of the self.

"The golden age of Canadian Jewish literature is not over," Mayne continued. "Even though writers like Richler, Klein and Layton have done most or all of their work, there is an enormous number of younger writers who are now publishing poetry, novels and short stories.

"What's exciting to me is that the centre of gravity of the Jewish Canadian world has moved from Quebec to Ontario. Toronto is a very thriving community with a critical mass of institutions. We've never seen anything like this before in Canadian Jewish history. For me, the fact that Parchment is published in Toronto speaks volumes...

"I think Parchment will become a permanent feature of the Canadian Jewish cultural landscape," he concluded. "It has to. We need it."

ORT project allows students to chat on the Internet

MONTREAL – Children at ORT schools around the world, as well as Canadian students, will soon be using the Internet to talk about terrorism, under a project initiated by and based at the ORT school in Moscow.

Children Against Terrorism will encourage youngsters to express their views on a topic that is all too close to home for many of them, while at the same time teach them the latest in computerized graphic designing.

The project was the beneficiary of ORT Montreal's recent concert at Place des Arts' Théâtre Maisonneuve that featured Academy Award-winning composer Marvin Hamlisch and local TV talk show host and singer Sonia Benezra. About $150,000 was raised. It's the first time in the 13 years ORT has held these galas that proceeds have not gone to a project in Israel.

ORT students around the world are to create a poster, stamp or other computer-generated artwork on the theme of anti-terrorism.

The pictures will be exhibited in Russia and elsewhere, and prizes awarded by an international jury. The best works will be placed on the World Wide Web and published in a booklet.

The use of ORTnet will enable instruction out of the Moscow ORT school and over the Internet in CorelDraw and other computerized design tools.

ORT has 250 schools in 50 countries, and at least 100 students are expected to participate.

They will take "classes" with their Moscow instructors, do homework and write exams over the Internet.

Russian ORT has considerable expertise in computer education and international projects. In 1994, with help from American ORT, it launched a three-year project to provide computer courses free of charge to Russian non-governmental organizations.

ORT Montreal executive-director Emmanuel Kalles said the key role the Moscow school is playing represents a return to the organization's roots. ORT was founded in Russia in 1880 to train poor Jews to make a living. Today, ORT has about 250,000 students on five continents, and still has the goal of providing education in useful work skills.

Kalles is now in discussion with several Canadian Jewish schools about the project.

ORT has been undergoing a revival in the former Soviet Union. Over 4,800 student are enrolled in the main centres in Moscow and St. Petersburg, as well as satellites elsewhere in Russia and in Kiev, Riga and Minsk. Its computer know-how is also being used to reinforce Jewish education. The new Twelve Tribes project provides software on Jewish history and culture and the Hebrew language to Jewish schools and centres throughout the region.

The honoree of this year's concert was Phil O'Brien, founder of Devencore Ltd., one of Canada's leading real estate service companies.

Roger Korman was chair of the event.

Saskatoon becomes home for community professional

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter

SASKATOON – Tom Rado refers to his workplace as the living room of the local Jewish community.

This fall he took on two newly created positions as Saskatoon's community development adviser and western region campus services co-ordinator. Home base for both positions is Saskatoon's Jewish Community Centre, located in the same building as Congregation Agudas Israel.

In the regional campus position, funded by the Council of Jewish Federations of Canada and based on a pilot project in Atlantic Canada, Rado serves Vancouver, Edmonton, Calgary, Saskatoon and Winnipeg, working with his counterparts in those cities and "making the circuit" every six or seven weeks. There is also outreach to campuses in other cities.

Tom Rado

This is the first time there has been this type of joint effort among federations in the west, said Rado, 28, in a recent phone interview. (Although Network Canada brought students from different regions together in the past, it was not affiliated with the federations. The student-run organization ceased operations last summer.)

Rado and his colleagues are planning a regional student conference to be held in March. Their goals include bringing a "sense of cohesion" to the approximately 1,000 students in the western region.

"I think our ultimate goal is, very simply, Jewish continuity," said Arnie Shaw, president of the Saskatchewan Jewish Council. "We're susceptible to losing our university kids. That's the time they maintain and increase their contact [with the Jewish community] or drop out completely. Liaison among the campuses provides an opportunity to introduce our Jewish students to other students across the country."

In the Saskatoon community, with 170 affiliated Jewish families out of a total population of 200,000, Rado's primary focus is the 38-member Jewish Student Association (JSA), based at the 19,000-student University of Saskatchewan, a five-minute drive from his office.

About three-quarters of the JSA members are from Saskatoon originally.

With the Jewish community representing such a small percentage of the greater community, interdating is "a fact of life," said Rado, adding that there are some students who do not want to intermarry.

Rado's goals include "a regular structured program" at the JSA. "Because it's such a small group, it's very different from the large universities. It's very easy to call 38 people and say, 'Let's get together.'"

Monthly Shabbat dinners have proved especially popular with the students. A recent program featured Karen Mock, national director of B'nai Brith Canada's League for Human Rights, speaking on Countering Hate in Canada.

The Saskatoon Jewish community is "a very tight community," Rado said.

"Everyone knows each other. They're extremely friendly and generous to outsiders" such as himself. A native of Toronto, Rado was educated at York University and the London School of Economics. He served for a year as B'nai Brith Canada's director for Western Canada.

Rado's duties as Saskatoon's first Jewish community professional also include serving as an adviser for B'nai Brith Youth Organization and helping in the administration of the United Israel Appeal campaign. His position is funded jointly by the Council of Jewish Federations, the Saskatchewan Jewish Council, the Saskatoon Jewish community and Saskatoon B'nai Brith.

Third referendum justified, says BQ chief advisor

By DAVID LAZARUS
CJN Staff Reporter

MONTREAL – Despite two previous No votes, another referendum is morally justified so long as Ottawa fails to satisfy Quebec's constitutional needs, one of the separatist movement's best-known spokesperson said here recently.

"I think sovereignty still is a legitimate option because the promise to renew the federation has not happened," Daniel Turp, one of the Bloc Québécois' (BQ) chief advisors, said at the recent national convention of the Canadian Council of Reform Judaism.

"Remember, it won't be put before the Quebec people unless the Parti Québécois (PQ) wins again."

Turp, now a BQ candidate in a future federal by-election, was joined for a "debate" on Quebec's proverbial question at the Temple Emanu-el Beth Sholom Synagogue by a federalist spokesperson, former Gazette editor Joan Fraser.

But while the two sides differed fundamentally on the pros and cons of separation, the "debate," held just a couple of days after the 20th anniversary of the PQ's first rise to power, turned out to be a relatively tame affair. No sparks flew and both Turp and Fraser expressed much mutual respect and admiration.

Predictably, however, there could be no meeting of the minds on the basic question, although both are self-described "moderates" within their respective ideological camps.

Turp, for example, continues, like Premier Lucien Bouchard, to favor a form of political and economic "partnership" with the rest of Canada (ROC) under separation.

"Since 1968, the PQ has always promoted the idea of a mutually-beneficial association," he said.

Turp also portrayed the PQ, despite "unfortunate comments" coming from certain elements within the PQ, as "inclusive" of all Quebecers.

"This is not a project to destroy Canada," Turp insisted. "I truly believe that there is a serious impasse and irreconcilable differences [between Quebec and Ottawa] on how the country should work and power should be divided.

"I'm willing to talk, and even more, to listen, to seek a better future in the spirit of compromise and understanding between peoples."

Fraser, calling it a "privilege" to share the podium with Turp but also jokingly expressing relief not to have to answer critical questions from anglophones about the Gazette's issue of the day, said the roots for separation lay in a "culture of grievance" dating back to the days of anglophone domination.

But whatever grievances may remain, the solution is not to separate, she argued.

"Despite the grievances, the majority of Quebecers do not want to leave," she said, including the 30 percent of Quebecers who voted Yes in the last referendum. "It's very difficult to convince Quebecers [to support independence] because Canada has been a success."

But most French-Quebecers do seem to want, "more dignity and strength within Canada," Fraser said.

Fraser said like the situation under René Lévesque 16 years ago, Quebec history is repeating itself, with the moderate, "sovereignty-association" forces within the PQ seeking to prevail in the face of elements wanting to take a much harder line.

But the paradox in all this, Fraser contended, is that by placing the current priority on "good government," and then delivering it, "they set about undermining their own arguments for sovereignty.

"Good government leads to a less perceived need for independence," she said.

Turp disagreed. He said it will be "good goverment" that will help the PQ get re-elected and pave the way for another, and hopefully successful, separation vote.

Literary magazine devotes issue to Jewish Canadian writers

By MYRON LOVE
CJN Prairie Correspondent

WINNIPEG – On Sunday, Nov. 10, Prairie Fire, a long standing Winnipeg-based literary magazine, launched its first anthology of Jewish Canadian writers with a public reading by three of the participants at a local bookstore.

The proposal for the Canadian Jewish literary opus was put forward by Winnipeg Jewish writer Maggie Dwyer following an evening of readings at the Rosh Pina Synagogue last winter. Prairie Fire has previously published special editions devoted to Ukrainian, Mennonite and Icelandic writers living in Canada. (Manitoba is home to one of the largest Icelandic communities in the world outside of Iceland, and a similarly sizeable Mennonite community.)

The works of about 60 writers, nearly half of whom are Winnipeggers, was included in the Prairie Fire edition. Among the nationally and internationally known local luminaries are Sheldon Oberman, Carol Matas, Carol Rose and Ed Kleiman. There were also works from such award winning writers as Matt Cohen (profiled in the Nov. 13 issue of The CJN), Shel Krakofsky, Dave Margoshes and Erna Paris.

The over 250-page publication includes prose, poetry, drama, essays and book reviews. The double-sized issue was made possible by financial assistance from the Jewish Foundation of Manitoba and Heritage Canada. The book is available from Prairie Fire Press Inc., 423-100 Arthur Street, Winnipeg R3B 1H3 (tel):204 943-9066).

Hamilton's new rabbi hopes to develop young leaders

By MOURA WOLPERT
CJN Correspondent

HAMILTON – Now that he's had a couple of months to settle in and get to know his congregation, Rabbi Gary Karlin, the recently appointed spiritual leader of Hamilton's Conservative Beth Jacob Congregation, is assessing his priorities.

Rabbi Karlin succeeds Rabbi Israel Silverman, who retired last summer after serving 30 years at Beth Jacob.

At 37, Rabbi Karlin says he fits "squarely into the ballpark" of a new young generation of rabbis taking over from older, long-serving rabbis.

"There seems to be a shift in generations," he says, referring to Temple Anshe Sholom, where Rabbi Irwin Zeplowitz succeeded Rabbi Bernard Baskin, who retired after 40 years. And like Rabbi Zeplowitz, Rabbi Karlin hopes to attract a new, young generation of members.

Developing new young leadership is, in fact, his main priority. He says he sees a younger Jewish generation "seeking a greater religious connection." In today's more open society, there is no longer the same need to turn to "outside secular Jewish" organizations for Jewish social contact, and so the synagogue, he notes, has the advantage.

Together with the congregation, Rabbi Karlin is trying to map out a program that "expands what the congregation has been doing for the last 10 years."

A New Yorker, Rabbi Karlin attended the University of Pennsylvania in Philadelphia and spent a year in Jerusalem at the Hebrew University. In 1987, he graduated from the Jewish Theological Seminary in New York and then served six years as rabbi of a synagogue in Westchester County, N.Y.

Going from Manhattan to Hamilton may seem like a drastic change, but Rabbi Karlin finds "the smallness" of Hamilton attractive, while its easy access to Toronto, with its large Jewish community and cultural amenities, a plus.

"The hardest bit to get used to," he says, "is things starting on time," unlike in New York, where Jewish functions would invariably begin "five, 10 or 15 minutes late."

Rabbi Karlin and his wife, Carol, were married in March in Atlanta and he tells of how he sent his application to Beth Jacob early before leaving for his wedding. Beth Jacob, meanwhile, was trying to contact him and when they finally reached him in New York at the end of March, they told him they were just about to give up.

Meeting Nelson Mandela again

By MAURICE LUCOW
CJN Western Correspondent

VICTORIA – Nate Lochoff, a Victoria resident, travelled all the way to South Africa to attend a law class reunion dinner last month.

It was a long way to go, but it was a very special occasion, because the host was President Nelson Mandela, who had been in the same law class as Lochoff in 1943.

Although they were together in the pre-apartheid era (the policy officially began five years later), conditions were far from favorable for blacks. Mandela was the only black in the class because higher education was out of reach for most of the black population.

After graduation, Lochoff and Mandela were professionally associated as lawyers, but Lochoff said he did not see his friend after Mandela became involved with the then-illegal African National Congress (ANC).

Lochoff bumped into Mandela again in 1992, when he returned to South Africa on a visit. By then, Mandela was out of prison, where he had spent 27 years because of his leadership of the ANC.

Mandela greeted him warmly, Lochoff said, and the two arranged to meet again a few days later to get reacquainted.

The dinner Lochoff attended recently was held in the university's faculty club in Johannesburg, with about 20 in attendance.

"The president honored me," said Lochoff, "by having me seated right beside him. I was the only one who had come from abroad."

In responding to a toast, Mandela showed no trace of bitterness despite the many years he had spent in prison, Lochoff said. He spoke of what he termed "the reconciliation" and said he was gratified that it is now possible for the two races to get along together to build a free and democratic country.

Mandela told Lochoff he hopes to make a personal visit to Israel in the near future.

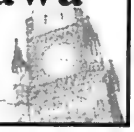
Canada playing catchup on trade with Israel

United States, E.U. years ahead

Scene in Ottawa

By RICHARD CLEROUX



OTTAWA – The free trade agreement with Israel has given Israel's critics an excellent opportunity to be heard in Parliament. And there will be a lot more criticism of Israel before the deal is through the Senate and is given Royal Assent.

The Israelis have none of this trouble. Their law allows the Canada-Israel trade agreement to become operative by a simple order of the Israeli cabinet without requiring approval by the Knesset.

Our law requires passage of the accord through both houses of Parliament.

The free trade deal between Canada and Israel was first proposed by Israel in 1988, but the proposal came just before a federal election, and the prime minister at the time, Brian Mulroney, thought it more prudent to wait, rather than trying to railroad the deal through Parliament.

There was a distinct possibility of a backlash against any attempt by Canada to get closer to Israel, which at the time was something of a pariah on the world's stage.

The United States did not have a similar hesitation and it pushed the deal through both houses without too much political damage. As a result, U.S. business interests gained a 10 year advantage over their Canadian counterparts.

The European Union did the same and likewise benefited.

It's estimated that as a result, Canada may have lost about $1 billion in trade during the intervening years.

Israel was convinced that the Canadians were too afraid of an Arab backlash to broach the subject of free trade with Israel ever again – even after Israel became a respected member of the international community under Yitzhak Rabin's peace initiatives.

Suddenly, during a meeting with Rabin in the fall of 1994, literally out of the blue, Prime Minister Jean Chrétien proposed a free trade deal. Rabin thought it over for two seconds and replied, "Sure why not?" or words to that effect.

That's how the Canada-Israel free trade agreement, which would become known as CIFTA, came to life again two years ago.

The major achievement in the two years since has been to obtain the tacit agreement of Palestinian Authority leader Yasser Arafat

This was done by inserting into the free trade deal, where the word "Israel" should appear, a phrase which reads "Israel or another CIFTA beneficiary."

Everybody knows who this means without spelling it out. It means the Palestinians – without defining them as such.

Slipping in a few extra words may not seem like a lot, but it's enough for Arafat and not too much for the hawks behind Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu. And if that's all it takes, so be it.

There's also another clause that says, "The Governor in Council may make regulations defining the expressions 'Israel or another CIFTA beneficiary' and 'imported from Israel or another CIFTA beneficiary' "

That means it will be the Canadian cabinet, not the House of Commons or the Senate, which will decide when and how much the Palestinians will benefit from the free trade. That's an interesting quirk in the free trade law.

The Israelis must trust the Chrétien government an awful lot to let the Canadian cabinet have such a decision-making power, but then self-interest has such a wonderful way of making us all trusting friends.

But then, you can be sure the cabinet is not about to define that other CIFTA beneficiary as being Iraq or Iran. Take my word for it. It will be the Palestinian Authority even if they have to go through hoops to get around naming them directly.

Now the final push to get the deal through the Senate is on, and the critics are having their last kick at the cat.

Michael Lynk, a Canadian lawyer who has worked for a number of Canadian-Arab organizations and also visited and lived in the Middle East, led a delegation of several Canadian-Arab groups which testified against the deal before the Commons Foreign Affairs committee this fall in Ottawa.

Lynk has followed up his Commons appearance with a number of articles in major newspapers. The main thesis of his opposition is that the deal is a reward to Israel, or will be seen as such, which he believes Israel does not deserve, given its current treatment of the Palestinian minority.

The problem for opponents of the free trade deal, such as Lynk, is that Canadian politicians don't see it as a reward for Israel, but rather as a chance for Canada to get a foot in the door in the Middle East, a place which up to now, the Americans and the Europeans have had all to themselves – duty-free.

The final straw came about a year ago when an official of a major Canadian electronics manufacturer let slip out that his company had deliberately shifted communications equipment parts to its subsidiary in Kentucky, rather than continuing to make the products in Canada. He admitted, but later denied, that it was to take advantage of the the U.S.-Israel free trade deal and save the 20 percent duties the firm would have to pay on any Canadian-made goods it sold to Israel.

The lack of a free trade deal with Israel during the past 10 years has been doubly hurtful to Canadian business. It was unfair, because while Canadian business faced high tariffs when they exported to Israel, Israeli business didn't bear the same burden. Israel is classed as a "developing" country like the rest of the Middle East, and so it enjoys the benefits of preferential tariffs on everything it sells to Canada. Canada, on the other hand, is not viewed as a "developing" country by anybody.

It was time to create "a level playing field," International Trade Minister Art Eggleton told the Commons Foreign Affairs Committee.

Considering the existing situation, that was putting it mildly.

Galganov vows to remain active

By JANICE ARNOLD
CJN Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Howard Galganov was applauded by a synagogue audience when he asserted that he will never give in to the ghetto mentality of shveig, that is, keeping quiet for fear of attracting the disfavor of non-Jews.

Galganov, 46, president of the Quebec Political Action Committee (QPAC), said the first time he encountered this fear was in the past few months while looking for a store to rent for Presque Pure Laine Inc., where he plans to post equal English and French signs in defiance of the law.

He recounted how in looking for a place on Queen Mary Road, where there is ample space available, landlords were eager to make a deal until they found out why he wanted it. Galganov said he made 100 inquiries before he secured a lease.

"One woman literally begged me not to rent there ... Fifty-odd years ago, that attitude led six million to their deaths," he said to wide applause.

Over 400 attended his talk at Beth Israel Beth Aaron Congregation in Cote St. Luc, most giving him a standing ovation at the end.

The appropriateness of Galganov's Holocaust analogy was questioned only by David Lisbona, 27.

"I don't believe we're in a Holocaust context, but people here are worried, especially those who lived through it or those who have parents who did," Galganov replied. "This is not a normal situation. People are scared. The separatists have stolen our souls. People aren't thinking about tomorrow in Quebec, but about who's left or leaving."

However, Galganov said he does not believe anti-Semitism is an issue in Quebec today.

"Our French neighbors are not hateful; they do not despise Canada or us ... People get along well here."

Galganov will not stop "insulting and attacking" separatists because he views them as enemies out to destroy his country and take away his rights as an equal citizen. He doesn't hesitate to do so because he believes the great majority of Quebecers are not, at heart, in favor of secession or the denial of anglophone rights.

In the new year, Galganov plans to launch a television advertising campaign to reach French Quebecers directly because he feels he has been "pilloried and denigrated" by the French media.

Galganov believes the Parti Quebecois is in disarray and that separatism is "over," and he takes full credit for it.

"We [QPAC] have done more to destroy the dream of ethnic nationalism than our political leaders, elites and intellectuals did in the last 20 years because we said 'enough, no more.' "

JNF shaliach completes tour of Jewish schools

By MAURICE LUCOW
CJN Western Correspondent

VANCOUVER – Itzhak Efron, eduction shaliach for the Jewish National Fund (JNF) in Canada, recently completed a 29-day tour of Jewish education facilities in Western Canada.

Efron met with teachers, educators and school boards to distribute materials and hold discussions on how to blend JNF material into school curricula, he said in a statement to The CJN.

"The next two years," he said, "are very significant in modern Jewish history. In 1997, we celebrate the 100th anniversary of the first Zionist Congress in Basel and in 1998, we mark the 50th anniversary of Medinat Yisrael."

Efron spoke to students about Jewish history, old and modern, and about the partnership of the Jewish world in land purchased by the JNF, "which acts as a trustee on behalf of Jewish people around the world."

He said there is a covenant between the Israeli government and JNF that gives JNF the responsibility for maintenance and development of publicly owned land in Israel. JNF is also has the responsibility for Zionist education in the Diaspora.

Canada sends more than 80 percent of JNF funds raised to Israel, Efron said. Israel, in turn, invests in Jewish education and maintains a shaliach who prepares material on Jewish traditions and values for Canadians.

Last year, some 12,000 youngsters from all over the world participated in five youth camps in Israel, Efron said. The camps are "heavily subsidized" by JNF.

The JNF's most recent major project is to develop Israel's "greatest land resources in the Negev," which occupies 58 percent of all land in Israel, he said.

CJC to receive U.S. investigator's 'Nazi' files

Congress spokesperson Bernie Farber said organization officials will meet with Rambam, evaluate the evidence and if it passes muster, transmit it to the appropriate Canadian officials.

Congress has long pushed federal authorities to bring Nazi war criminals to justice and has criticized the slow pace of recent efforts to begin denaturalization proceedings. "I hope it embarrasses the country," said Irving Abella, chair of Congress' war crimes committee, referring to Rambam's investigation. "I hope it embarrasses the government. I hope it embarrasses the judiciary."

In a telephone interview from London, England, Rambam said he has already forwarded a tape of his conversation with alleged war criminal Antanas Kenstavicius to George Carruthers, the Vancouver Justice Department lawyer handling the deportation case.

"We didn't want to be responsible for them losing the case by us withholding evidence," he said.

The Kenstavicius interview was one of the more jarring elements in a sometimes shocking expose published recently in the Jerusalem Post Magazine (JP). The story, written by JP reporters Robert Sarner and Steve Leibowitz, chronicles Rambam's efforts to track down and expose Nazi war criminals living openly in Canada. Rambam posed under an assumed identity and told the interview subjects he was working on a doctoral thesis on the interchangeability of civilian and wartime forces in law enforcement.

Rambam's first personal encounter in Canada was with Kenstavicius and his wife in their home in Hope, B.C. Kenstavicius is one of eight men federal authorities are attempting to deport for allegedly lying to immigration authorities about their wartime activities. Kenstavicius allegedly served as deputy chief of police and chief of police in Svencionya, Lithuania between 1941-43 and was involved in the detention, arrest and mass execution of thousands of Jews.

Kensavicius has denied all these allegations and is resisting the federal government's attempts to deport him. His hearing is scheduled to begin within two months.

In his interview with Rambam as reported in the JP Magazine, Kenstavicius described how Lithuanian Jews were murdered: "Ten guys stay on ditch and then coming the commander. Bang! and they fall down. Some time, repeat. Bang! Bang! and they all fall in ditch. All the day. After, there're no mens. Then the womens in separate camp. Separate barracks. The kids go with wives. First party, I look, after I no want to see. I sit there and I no want to see. And then, 09 November, one o'clock, finished. No more Jews."

Another interview subject, located in Toronto, talked about his days as a soldier in wartime Lithuania and denied persecuting Jews, except to occasionally "amuse" himself by pointing a gun at Jews and making them run for their lives. Later, he admitted to shooting one Jew.

Altogether, Rambam located 157 alleged war criminals, interviewed 62 and secretly taped their conversations. Reporters were present for 20 of the interviews and seven of the interview subjects admitted to either killing Jews or facilitating their murder, Rambam said.

Finding the alleged Nazis was not that difficult, he continued. Names were provided by Efraim Zuroff, head of the Simon Wiesenthal Centre's Israel office as well as by Yad Vashem.

Some were found by simply "opening a telephone book where many are listed under their original names. Others were found through driver license registration lists or property ownership files," the JP reported.

In a news scrum with reporters after the JP story appeared, Justice Minister Allan Rock said he had not yet seen the material gathered by Rambam but "if they wish to share it with us, that would be very helpful... We'll look at it very carefully but I would be surprised to know there were that many people we overlooked... in regards to the efforts that have been made in the last 10 or 15 years."

Rock went on to question the value of the evidence: "There were investigators who worked full time for years going to Eastern Europe, looking at archive documents, finding and interviewing witnesses and preparing evidence that was of sufficient quality and reliable to put before a tribunal. I think that's the kind of work that's required. A casual interview or going on word of mouth or hearsay is quite a different matter. That's not sufficient to start court proceedings."

Rambam believes that despite Rock's best intentions, "I don't think he has the strong cooperation from all parts of the government and legal community."

Reflecting on Canada's post-war record, he suggested "thousands of war criminals came to Canada and no effort was made to pursue them until now."

Asked why he choose to investigate the Canadian scene, Rambam quoted onetime bank robber Willy Sutton who said he robbed banks because that's where the money is. "Canada is where the Nazis are," Rambam said.

A former member of the Jewish Defence League (JDL) in the United States, Rambam has had longstanding ties to Canada. In 1983, he cooperated with the Canadian JDL in providing security for U.S. author John Loftus.

He cooperated with the Canadian JDL on other matters but after a time, he and Canadian JDL leaders had a falling out.

PARK INAUGURATED

The mayor of Tel Aviv, Roni Milo (fourth from left) and the Canadian Ambassador to Israel, David Berger (second from left), were in attendance at the recent inauguration of a 2.5 acre park in the southern Tel Aviv neighborhood of Neve-Chen. The municipality and the Tel Aviv Foundation have named this park, which contains stone sculptures and playground areas, after John, Michael and David Sereny of Toronto (third, fifth and sixth from left) in appreciation of the generosity of John Sereny for the benefit of Tel Aviv-Yafo residents.

Winnipeg shul to mark 90th anniversary

By MYRON LOVE
CJN Prairie Correspondent

WINNIPEG – The Beth Israel Synagogue is celebrating its 90th anniversary next April 12 with An Evening With the Cantors, featuring the city's chazzanim.

The present synagogue is only 20 years old, but the Hebrew Sick Benefit Association (HSBA) from which the Beth Israel grew was incorporated in 1906 as one of the first landsmanshaften to be established in Winnipeg's burgeoning Jewish community at that time.

Before medicare and other government-provided social services, organizations like the HSBA provided members with free medical and dental services, loans, religious services on the High Holy Days and even free burials in its own cemetery. It established the Hebrew Sick Benefit Cemetery in north Winnipeg 1911, making it the oldest active Jewish cemetery in the city.

For most of its existence, the HSBA was based on Selkirk Avenue near Main Street in the heart of the Jewish community. Its building held the Queen's Theatre, and Jewish theatre continued to be a drawing card until the 1950s.

By 1930, the HSBA had 275 member families and was a cornerstone of the community.

After the war, when government introduced its own social services, the HSBA remained a social and religious fraternal organization. In the 1960s, with the Jewish centre of gravity moving north, the Association also began looking north. It bought a piece of land in the new suburb of Garden City and, in 1970, built the HSBA Gardens, the first apartment complex for Jewish seniors. In 1976, in partnership with the Atares Israel (also known as the Mezeritcher) Synagogue, it built the Beth Israel Synagogue next to the apartment block.

The membership now stands at about 225 and has been growing in recent years under the leadership of its young Rabbi Alan Green.

Jerusalem 'occupied territory': draft UN resolution

BY DEBRA NUSSBAUM COHEN
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

RYE, N.Y. – The Union of Orthodox Jewish Congregations of America (OU) has sharply criticized a draft UN resolution that refers to Jerusalem as "occupied Palestinian territory."

The resolution "brings us back to the sorry era of utterly unrealistic and poisonous rhetoric that so characterized the United Nations for too many years," said an OU statement that was adopted by the group's officers last Friday.

The statement was adopted during the OU's biennal convention, held here over the Thanksgiving weekend.

"The news that Egypt has joined in co-sponsoring this outrageous draft raises serious questions as to the Mubarak regime's continued commitment to the spirit of Camp David," said the statement, referring to the 1978 Camp David Accords which became the basis for Egyptian-Israeli peace.

The resolution is being co-sponsored by Egypt and other Muslim countries, including Bangladesh, Malaysia, Mauritania, Sudan, Tunisia, United Arab Emirates and Yemen.

The resolution, which is expected to be submitted shortly to the UN General Assembly, calls for "restitution and full compensation" to the Palestinian people for the "exploitation by Israel, the occupying power, of the natural resources of the occupied Palestinian territory, including Jerusalem, and other Arab territories occupied by Israel since 1967."

The General Assembly opened its annual debate on the Middle East late last week and is expected to vote this week on a resolution concerning the "Question of Palestine."

The draft resolution describes an "additional, dangerous impact of Israeli colonial settlements on Palestinian and other Arab natural resources, especially the confiscation of land and the theft of water resources."

There are several reasons why the strongly-worded resolution may be circulating now, according to David Luchins, an OU vice president and senior adviser to Sen. Daniel P. Moynihan (D-N.Y.).

Egypt may be seeking to retaliate against the United States for its recent veto of UN General Secretary Boutros Boutros-Ghali's bid for a second term, Luchins said. Boutros-Ghali is Egyptian.

Luchins said another possible explanation is that the resolution is intended to warn Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu "that if he doesn't move on Hebron, things will be tougher," referring to the ongoing Israeli-Palestinian negotiations on implementing an agreement to turn over most of the West Bank town to Palestinian self-rule.

"At worst, the resolution is an effort to implode the peace process," Luchins said.

If Egypt and the other sponsors "are serious about this resolution, it's a deal-breaker" for the peace process because "it can only delight the most extreme opponents of the peace process on both the Arab and Israeli sides," he said.

Jewish settlers reach out in meeting with Arafat

By NAOMI SEGAL
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM – A group of Jewish settlers met secretly with Palestinian Authority leader Yasser Arafat last week to discuss tolerance and joint business projects.

During the 90-minute meeting in Bethlehem, Arafat welcomed the participants and stressed that the recognition of Palestinian rights was the only way to peaceful coexistence.

"There have always been Jews among us and we have lived as good neighbors," he was quoted as saying. "While we spoke mainly about economic dialogue, this depends on recognition of the political rights of the Palestinian people."

David Bedein, a resident of Efrat who participated in the meeting, said it was prompted by an interest in tourism and business on both sides.

He said many Palestinians in the business community who had been approached by their Jewish counterparts were unwilling to pursue contacts without the go-ahead from Arafat.

Bedein said it made sense for Jews and Palestinians to work together on tourism, especially in areas between Bethlehem and Hebron, which have numerous Jewish, Christian and Muslim holy sites.

The meeting also addressed political issues, Bedein said, but added that regardless of the difficulties in the political process, he believed that economic ties could flourish.

"You can do business with your neighbor, even if you hate your neighbor," he told Israel Radio.

Among those who attended the meeting was Yehuda Wachsman, whose son Nachshon was kidnapped and killed by members of the Islamic fundamentalist Hamas movement two years ago.

Wachsman said he sought Arafat's support in establishing a centre to teach tolerance among Jews and Arabs.

"I described the plan for the centre and offered to include the Palestinian Authority," he said.

Slovak Jewish group seeks restitution from Czech bank

By RANDI DRUZIN
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

PRAGUE – The Association of Slovak Jewish Communities has called on the Czech National Bank to provide compensation for gold that was taken from the local Jewish community during World War II by the Slovak government.

Location of gold not clear

Association spokesman Jozef Weiss told a Czech newspaper that the gold "was stolen from Slovak Jews during the war and then transferred to Prague."

The Czech National Bank is a successor to the State Bank of Czechoslovakia, which obtained the gold from the Slovak government in 1953.

The association wants Slovak victims of the Nazis to be compensated by the bank, which was created by a Nazi-puppet government in Slovakia.

The location of the gold, however, is not clear.

Bank spokesman Pavel Palivec said all its assets, gold included, were divided between the Czech Republic and Slovakia when Czechoslovakia split into the two countries in 1993.

But the Slovak government maintains that the gold in question was kept separate from other assets and was therefore not included in the division of former federal assets.

Syria's chemical arms to head talks agenda

By STEVE RODAN
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM – Israel and the U.S. launch a two-day strategic dialogue this week in Washington that will focus on Syria's chemical and biological weapons, and terrorism against U.S. and Israeli targets, defense officials said on Sunday.

The strategic talks, called the Joint Political Military Group, are held twice a year, alternating between Israel and Washington. They include officials of the Pentagon, the Defense Ministry, and the intelligence agencies of both countries. The talks on the Israeli side are headed by Defense Ministry director-general Ilan Biran and ministry adviser David Ivry.

The talks review strategic issues from the last meeting, six months ago, and assess developments expected in the next half-year. The key issues have been terrorism, weapons proliferation and arms supplies.

Iran and Syria will continue to be a major issue of discussion, officials said. This includes what Israeli defense officials assert is a newly-acquired capability by Syria to produce chemical and biological warheads and place them on Scud surface-to-surface missiles.

The officials say Syria has received the help of Russian scientists in its chemical and biological weapons program, which is conducted in fortified, underground facilities. The program includes the manufacture of Sarin, VX nerve-gas and anthrax, a lethal bacteria.

Strategists have suggested that Syria's non-conventional arsenal might have played a role in restraining Israel during Syria's troop redeployment near Israeli positions in the Golan Heights in August. In an interview published Nov. 25 in the London-based Arabic daily "Al Hayat," Defense Minister Yitzhak Mordechai said, "We know that Syria increased its production capacity, particularly that of VX. I want to stress that we have information regarding this matter."

But Yiftah Shapir, a researcher at Tel Aviv University's Jaffee Center for Strategic Studies, played down the significance of Syria's chemical weapons arsenal as a means of pressuring Israel. Shapir said chemical weapons are no match for Israel's purported nuclear capability.

"Chemical weapons are a deterrent," Shapir said. "They are meant to stop us from doing something, not to force us to do something.

"The weapons cannot force us to withdraw from the Golan," Shapir added.

Other issues in the strategic dialogue, officials said, include bilateral defense cooperation such as the Arrow anti-missile defense system and ways to maintain the U.S. pledge that Israel would keep a qualitative military edge over the Arab states. In the past, this commitment has meant that Israel will have the latest U.S. weapons and technology approved for export.

Counter-terrorism and the stability of Middle Eastern regimes will be key issues in the strategic talks, defense officials said.

Defense sources said that since the Dhahran bombing in Saudi Arabia in June, in which Saudi authorities withheld key information from the FBI, U.S. officials have been quietly moving personnel out of the kingdom to alternative areas for military training. Last month, 1,200 U.S. Marines and support staff, in a trip planned before the Dhahran bombing, arrived for several days of training in the Negev.

"I have talked to people in the U.S. government and they have said clearly that they are looking for alternatives to Saudi Arabia," Gerald Steinberg, senior researcher at Bar-Ilan University's Begin-Sadat Center for Strategic Studies, said.

More housing settlements planned

By HERB KEINON
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM – The Jordan Valley and Ma'aleh Efraim will be an "integral part of Israel in any final-status agreement," Prime Minister Binyamin Netanyahu told Jordan Valley settlement leaders, adding that they will soon be given final approval to build 470 new housing units.

A spokesman for the prime minister said Netanyahu assured the settlement leaders that the government is "fully obligated to the development of the Jordan Valley, and that even in this difficult budgetary year, money was allocated for the infrastructure development of Jordan Valley roads and for the development of Ma'aleh Efraim."

David Elhayani, head of the Jordan Valley Settlements Committee, said that 124 of the new housing units are to be built in Ma'aleh Efraim and 350 others in settlements throughout the region.

Elhayani said this was the first time since Netanyahu took office that he has been so unequivocal about the future of the region. "Rabin made similar statements, but Netanyahu, since taking office, has never said anything like this," he said.

Netanyahu's statement, made during a meeting with Elhayani, Jordan Valley Regional Council head David Levy, and Ma'aleh Efraim Local Council head David Kopolovitch, comes just a few days after Netanyahu assured Ariel Mayor Ron Nachman that his settlement would also remain part of Israel in any final agreement map.

In addition to the new housing units, Elhayani said Netanyahu promised some NIS 80 million over the next two years to refurbish and expand Route 90, which runs the length of the Jordan Valley. "This will turn the road into a key artery and enable much development," Elhayani said.

Elhayani said National Infrastructure Minister Ariel Sharon, who attended the meeting along with Industry and Trade Minister Natan Sharansky, broached the idea of turning the region into a free-trade zone similar to what exists in Eilat.

Jan Zwartendijk Humanitarian Ethics and Values Award

Bestowed Upon

Leslie L. Dan

by the Canadian Friends of Boys Town Jerusalem

In the summer of 1940, the darkest days of World War II, 150,000 Jews were trapped in Lithuania between the Nazis on one side and Stalin's Red Army on the other. The Jews were desperate to escape, but the countries of the world had closed their doors to them. In a desperate scheme, Jan Zwartendijk, a gentile Dutch businessman acting as the honorary Dutch Consul in Kovno, Lithuania, agreed to issue bogus visas to the Dutch island of Curaçao, which, together with transit visas supplied by the local Japanese Consul, allowed 2300 Jews to escape to safety. Zwartendijk and his family returned to his Nazi-occupied homeland and his lifesaving act of heroism, all but forgotten, was never recognized by the world Jewish community.

Dutch diplomat Jan Zwartendijk, who rescued 2300 Jews during the Holocaust.

Fifty-six years later, a Jewish historian brought this unsung hero's story to the attention of the leaders of Boys Town Jerusalem, one of Israel's leading centers for technological education. Its dean was a student of one of the Jewish scholars who survived the Holocaust thanks to Zwartendijk. The school was determined to give Zwartendijk and his family the long overdue honor and thanks that he deserved. After a Holocaust garden was dedicated in his honor at the Boys Town Children's Park in May, the school resolved to establish The Jan Zwartendijk Institute of Humanitarian Ethics and Values, to inspire the youth of today, both at Boys Town and around the world, to emulate the heroic example of Jan Zwartendijk and to promulgate his standards of "common decency".

An audience of Boys Town friends and supporters at the November 17th reception in honor of Leslie Dan, held in North York, Ontario.

On Sunday, November 17th, the Canadian Friends of Boys Town Jerusalem presented one of Canadian Jewry's most distinguished lay leaders, Mr. Leslie Dan, with the first JAN ZWARTENDIJK HUMANITARIAN ETHICS AND VALUES AWARD at a reception in North York, Ontario. The event was held under the joint patronage of the State of Israel and The Netherlands, and in the presence of Consul Generals of each country. The many friends of Leslie Dan and supporters of Boys Town in attendance, listened to a presentation by Dr. Michael Berenbaum, Director of the Research Institute of the United States Holocaust Museum.

The International President of Boys Town Jerusalem, Michael Scharf, presented the award to Mr. Dan with the following remarks: "GIVEN THE MEANS, ANYONE CAN BE A PHILANTHROPIST. HE MERELY NEEDS TO SHARE HIS RESOURCES. HOWEVER, IT IS THE RARE INDIVIDUAL WHO IS A HUMANITARIAN. THIS REQUIRES CHARACTER, PRINCIPLE, SPECIAL SENSITIVITY AND ETHICAL FORTITUDE. MR. DAN, THESE ARE THE ATTRIBUTES OF YOUR HUMANITARIANISM WHICH IS AN INSPIRATION TO ALL. AND IT IS WHY BOYS TOWN IS PAYING YOU THIS WELL-DESERVED TRIBUTE BY ESTABLISHING A CHAIR IN ETHICS AT THE JAN ZWARTENDIJK INSTITUTE OF HUMANITARIAN ETHICS AND VALUES."

Mr. Dan is the Chairman and CEO of the Novopharm Group of pharmaceutical and manufacturing firms. Mr. Dan founded the Canadian Medicine Aid Program providing medicine and aid for the sick of the third world, and has given generously to many of Canada's leading hospitals and medical research institutions, in addition to his support for Boys Town Jerusalem. Mr. Dan recently received the government of Canada's highest honor, the presentation of the Order of Canada, which is presented with the Commemorative Medal for "significant contributions to compatriots, community and to Canada."

Presentation of the Jan Zwartendijk Humanitarian Ethics and Values Award to Leslie Dan (2nd from right) by the International President of Boys Town Jerusalem, Michael Scharf (2nd from left). Also pictured are Dr. Michael Berenbaum (left), Director of the Research Institute of the United States Holocaust Museum, the guest speaker at the event, and Rabbi Ronald L. Gray (right), Executive Vice President of the Boys Town Jerusalem Foundation of America.

Born out of the ashes of the Holocaust, Boys Town Jerusalem was founded in 1949 as a positive, visionary response to the loss of 1.5 million Jewish children and for the children of the masses of destitute Jews who have poured into Israel from countries around the world. Today, the school which is located on an 18-acre campus in the Bayit Vegan suburb of Jerusalem, is a leading educational center, providing its 1,000 students -- including many recent immigrants from the former Soviet Union -- intensive Torah studies coupled with a quality academic and technological education. Boys Town's students come from over 170 communities in Israel and trace their origins to 44 countries and 6 continents. Over 75% of the students come from disadvantaged backgrounds, requiring extensive scholarship aid. The Canadian Friends of Boys Town Jerusalem is located at 2788 Bathurst Street, Suite 200. Israel and Turkey agree to continue defence accord

By STEVE RODAN
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM – Israel and Turkey have signed an accord to continue defence cooperation in 1997, a move regarded by officials in both countries as a considerable achievement in the face of opposition in Ankara's Islamic-led government.

The agreement signed last week will maintain military exercises and launch new defence industrial projects, officials said. Under a first accord signed Feb. 23, Israeli pilots conducted training flights in Turkey.

"It's more or less a continuation of the agreement we have been implementing this year," a defence official said. "That, in itself, is an achievement."

The accord was signed in Ankara by an Israeli delegation headed by Defence Ministry adviser David Ivry.

The meeting in the Turkish capital marked the first time strategic dialogue was held between Israel and Turkey. Defence Ministry officials said those talks further strengthened Turkish and Israeli military cooperation.

Ivry, special adviser to Defence Minister Yitzhak Mordechai, met with the Turkish Army's deputy chief of staff Gen. Chabek Beer. Ivry was joined by Maj.-Gen. Gaby Ashkenazy, assistant director of the General Staff Branch.

The proposed upgrading of 54 Turkish F-4 Phantom fighters in a deal worth more than $600 million is being held up by the Turkish government, Israeli officials say, despite Israeli bank guarantees of $410 million.

One official said the deal requires the signatures of all Turkey's more than 30 ministers. The only holdout, he said, is Prime Minister Necmettin Erbakan.

Turkish and Israeli defence sources said Erbakan, who entered office last year on a pledge of reducing military cooperation with Israel, is complaining the deal is too expensive for Ankara.

"He has some reservations in the financial sphere," an Israeli defence source said.

But Erbakan apparently was overruled by the Turkish military, which has been demonstrating increasing defiance of the prime minister's authority. Last month, Foreign Minister Tansu Ciller signed a $5-billion defence-procurement package while Erbakan was travelling in North Africa.

Israeli officials said Erbakan, embarrassed over his failed trips to such countries as Libya, has apparently ended his efforts to decrease defence cooperation with Israel. In what analysts regard as an attempt to establish a balance with the cooperation with Israel, Ankara has formed a bilateral defence committee with Jordan to study joint efforts in industrial cooperation and counter-terrorism.

Still, both Ankara and Jerusalem will maintain a low-profile relationship, in order not to arouse Arab or Islamic opposition.

"Each side knows the sensitive side of the other," an Israeli official said.

Funding questioned

JERUSALEM – The dovish religious group Netivot Shalom called upon National Religious Party (NRP) MKs last week to distance themselves from an appeal by two leading rabbis, Haim Druckman and Avraham Zuckerman, to raise money for the defence of Nahum Korman.

Korman, security officer at the Hadar Betar settlement near Jerusalem, has been accused of the Oct. 27 murder of 11-year-old Hilmi Shoushi. He has denied the charges.

"We are not saying that Korman does not deserve legal defence like all other citizens," a letter the group sent the NRP MKs read. "But an appeal like that at a time like this is tantamount to giving support for his action. We are concerned about the educational message that will be deduced from this. The public is liable to think that these acts are justified and legitimate in the eyes of the rabbis."

Last week, Rabbi Druckman defended his appeal for funds for Korman, saying on Israel Radio: "I am speaking about a man who is responsible for security in a settlement. Children came and threw rocks, and he [Korman] claims that he did not do anything. The court will determine. I want to make it possible for him to defend himself...I am not saying who is right or not, I want the court to determine. But I don't want people to already determine that he is guilty."

Regarding the publicity surrounding the case, Rabbi Druckman said that although Korman was not "physically lynched," he has been "morally lynched."

Rabbi Druckman said that there are two sides to the story.

Netanyahu, Arab leaders exchange barbs

[Cont'd from page 1]

"Our neighbors will learn that instead of cursing and threatening, they should cooperate with us to advance peace," he said.

In an effort to tone down Arab rhetoric against the government, Defence Minister Yitzhak Mordechai said an agreement on Hebron redeployment was at hand and reminded the Arab states that nothing would be gained by force.

"Forcible steps will be met with forcible steps. It won't be worthwhile for the other side to act this way. It will be better if they seek other ways," Mordechai said following a meeting with Egyptian ambassador Mohammed Bassiouny.

Regarding the Arab League's warning, Mordechai said, "I demand that Arab states reduce their belligerent tone, which isn't helping anyone."

Mordechai's meeting with Bassiouny, which took place at a Jerusalem hotel, had been planned in advance, but defence officials said Mordechai used the opportunity to stress to the Egyptians that an agreement with the Palestinians on Hebron was very close. Mordechai urged Bassiouny to have Egypt agree to serve as a bridge to the Arab world – particularly the Palestinians – for Israel, Defence Ministry officials said.

Mordechai said Israel and the Palestinians have agreed on most issues and he hoped that negotiators would be able to draft the agreement within the coming days.

"Many times we have said, 'Look, it's about to happen.' I think [now] that if the Palestinians don't lay any land mines, as they have lately, we will be able in a very short amount of time, even this week, to conclude matters," Mordechai said.

Mordechai said later that the Hebron agreement with the Palestinians needed to be wrapped up quickly to move on to other agreements with Arab states.

Regarding the Syrians, Mordechai said Israel had no intention of going to war and called on Damascus to return to the peace talks.

Meanwhile, Arab League secretary general Esmat Abdel Meguid said at a news conference last Sunday that "Israel is endangering the peace process with settlements which are considered against international law and are totally rejected by Arab countries and the world community."

He was speaking at the end of an emergency session of the 22-member league's council at which the Palestinian Authority's (PA) mission and Syria requested a protest over the settlement issue.

A statement the PA issued at the Arab League meeting declared, "Israel insists on ripping apart the West Bank to prevent the creation of a Palestinian state, but we are determined to defend our lands by all possible means against [Israel's] racist settlement plans."

Meguid said he would contact the United States, Russia, the European Union and foreign ministers of the Islamic Organization Conference to convey Arab dismay concerning Israel's settlement policy.

Meguid said the league does not have the power to ask the member states to reconsider steps towards normalizing relations with Israel, and would leave the issue to each state's leadership.

There were several other examples over the weekend of continuing hostility in the region.

Jordan's King Hussein said he was becoming a "little impatient" with the pace of the Middle East peace process and talked about the urgency of ensuring the peace talks do not go off track.

Hebron settlers are torn by fear

By SHELDON KIRSHNER

The Jewish settlers of Hebron -a hotbed of Arab nationalism and Islamic fundamentalism - fear for their security.

Mideast Analysis

Worried that their safety will be compromised by an Israeli withdrawal from the Arab sector of Hebron, the only major Arab urban centre in the West Bank with a Jewish population, they have repeatedly urged Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu not to redeploy.

A minuscle minority in a town of 120,000 Sunni Muslims, the Jews know full well that they are vulnerable to Arab attacks,whether or not Israel complies with the Oslo accords and redeploys.

Cognizant of their vulnerability, the Sephardic chief rabbi of Israel, Eliahu Bakshi Doron, recently decreed that Hebron's Jewish community can be uprooted if leaving them in a Palestinian-controlled town would endanger their lives.

It was the last thing they wanted to hear. For the Jewish settlers of Hebron – the site of the oldest Jewish community in the world – are determined to remain, come what may.

The concern for their well-being is precisely the issue which has held up an agreement between Israel and the Palestine Authority since October. Last week, there was still no sign of an imminent breakthrough, heightening the settlers' angst.

Judging by what has happened in the past, they have cause to be nervous. Hebron, though rich in Jewish lore, has a blood-soaked history.

Hebron, which is equally holy to Muslims, has been ruled by the Canaanites, the Israelites, the Babylonians, the Romans, the Byzantines, the Arabs, the Crusaders, the Mamelukes, the Ottomans, the British, the Jordanians and the Israelis.

Israel captured Hebron in the 1967 Six Day War. But with the signing of the Oslo 2 accord in September 1995, the Palestine Authority assumed authority for virtually all the civilian affairs of its Arab residents, while Israel retained control of several Jewish enclaves in Hebron and of the adjacent settlement of Kiryat Arba.

Religious Jews revere Hebron. The patriarchs (Abraham, Isaac and Jacob) and the matriarchs Sarah, Rebecca and Leah are buried in the Tomb of the Patriarchs. King David was annointed in Hebron, which is mentioned 87 times in the Bible.

Jews lived in relative peace following the Arab conquest in 638 CE. The Arabs, however, converted the Tomb of the Patriarchas into a mosque and forbade Jews to pray there. Expelled from Hebron by the Crusaders, the Jews returned with the Mamelukes in 1260.

The advent of the Ottoman Turkish era in 1517 was marked by a pogrom. The survivors fled to Beirut, only to return in 1533. The Jewish community grew, but the majority of its pious inhabitants were poverty-stricken, largely sustained by donations from abroad.

In 1775, when Hebron was a rabbinic centre of note, the Jews were rocked by a blood libel. Accused of murdering the son of a local Muslim dignitary, they were forced to pay an enormous fine. In 1834, when Hebron was home to about 700 Jews, another pogrom broke out.

During World War I, the community was assailed by hunger and disease. The British occupation eased conditions. But in 1929, the community was subjected to a pogrom which claimed 67 lives and prompted the survivors to flee to Jerusalem. Thirty one Jewish families returned two years later, but they were evacuated by the British in 1936, during the Arab Revolt.

In 1968, on the eve of Passover, a group of Jews, led by Rabbi Moshe Levinger, checked into Hebron's Park Hotel under the guise of Swiss tourists. After a month, they moved into an Israeli army camp overlooking Hebron. In 1970, much to the indignation of the Palestinians, who feared that their lands would be expropriated, the Labor party government sanctioned the construction of Kiryat Arba.

Emboldened by the rise of Kiryat Arba, more zealous settlers tried to reestablish a community in Hebron itself, moving into buildings where Jews had once lived. In each instance, they were evicted by the Israeli army. But finally, the authorities relented.

In 1980, after the murder of seven yeshiva students in Hebron in two separate assaults, the Likud government decided to rebuild Hebron's Jewish quarter. The fateful decision brought Arab strikes and further bloodshed.

Since then, the community has expanded, and now includes the enclaves of Beit Hadassah, Tel Rumeida, Beit Schneerson, Beit Kastel, Beit Chason and Beit Romano.

For nationalistic and religious reasons, the Palestinians are irreconcilably opposed to a Jewish presence in Hebron. By all accounts, there are about 450 Jews in Hebron. As a result, Jews have borne the brunt of numerous terrorist attacks. In response, Jewish vigilantes have gone on the rampage. Baruch Goldstein's murderous onslaught in February 1994 was the bloodiest example of such revenge killings.

The tension persists and, sadly, Hebron has become a symbol of Arab-Israeli violence.

Excited about role

Two Toronto girls star as 10-year-old Jane Eyre

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO – Two young girls sit side by side on a dressing room couch, their voices blending harmoniously as they practise a song from the musical Jane Eyre.

Sara Farb, 9, and Sophia Perlman, 11, alternate the role of the 10-year-old Jane in the production now on at the Royal Alexandra Theatre.

The poignant song over, the girls revert to their natural exhuberance in a joint interview.

Although both have several years' acting experience, they are duly impressed by the venerable Royal Alex.

"It's big. Huge! Cool!" says Farb, a student at Associated Hebrew Schools of Toronto.

The play, based on the novel by Charlotte Bronte, is also "cool," the girls agree.

Farb, who appeared in Annie , a production of the children's musical theatre troupe Charactors, also sang recently in A Kiddush for Yiddish.

She tried out for Jane Eyre at the suggestion of one of the owners of Charactors and "reached the ceiling" on learning she had the part.

Perlman, a student at Alpha Alternative School, was equally thrilled to be cast as Jane, screaming with excitement when she was told she had the part.

Sophia Perlman (left) and Sara Farb star as the young heroine in Jane Eyre. [Frances Kraft photo]

Perlman has been acting since the age of four, when she appeared with the Kensington Carnival Arts Society in a show about the history of Kensington Market. At a young age – with the support of her parents – she set out to get herself an agent. She has sung for four years with the Canadian Children's Opera Chorus.

"This is the biggest thing I've ever done, although at the time everything else seemed big," she says. "It was sort of one of my goals to get into a big musical like this, but I never dreamed it would happen so soon."

Perlman enjoys acting because it enables her to express her feelings and "be someone else." (Unlike her, the young Jane is well organized, she points out. "There's stuff all over the place," she says, indicating her area of the dressing room.)

In addition to acting, Perlman expresses her creativity by writing short stories and plays as well as articles for the bi-monthly community newspaper (The Kensington Drum) published by her parents.

Farb also enjoys writing short stories, as well as playing the piano. Like the young Jane, she likes birds and books; unlike the character, Farb loves her relatives and refrains from talking back to people, "because I get in trouble [when I do]."

She likes acting and loves singing, and says she'd like to be an actress when she grows up, but Perlman, wagging a finger playfully at her younger friend, cautions her that "you can't count on it."

Perlman might want to be an actress herself, she says, but if it doesn't work out, she's thinking of going to law school.

"I mean an actress in this kind of play," specifies Farb.

"You can't count on it," repeats Perlman. "We're lucky!"

"Yeah!" agrees Farb. "We're lucky."

Travel Talk

by Bill Gladstone

Buffalo – The New Jerusalem

While in Buffalo recently, I visited the Buffalo and Erie County Historical Society building, 25 Nottingham Court off Elmwood Avenue (near the Knox-Albright Gallery), an elegant architectural remnant of the 1901 Pan American Exposition.

Inside, as part of the exhibition, Neighbors, which explores the area's ethnic and cultural diversity, I came across a remnant from an earlier era: the cornerstone for Ararat, an envisioned city for the world's Jews that Mordecai Manuel Noah, a Philadelphia-born writer and politician, attempted to found on Grand Island in the year 1825.

The little-known story of Ararat is one of the most fascinating chapters of the early history of Jews in North America. In the biblical account of the flood, Ararat is the mountain where Noah's ark came to rest when the waters receded.

This story involves another man named Noah and another place called Ararat, located about 160 kilometres from Toronto.

In 1825, Grand Island was an uninhabited and heavily wooded island in the Niagara River. Noah, dreamed of establishing a community called Ararat there as a "city of refuge" for all the Jews of the world.

An early, ardent Zionist, Noah never surrendered the messianic dream of a return to Palestine. In the meantime, however, he felt that his oppressed Jewish brethren around the globe deserved a "temporary and provisionary" home where they could live with freedom and dignity.

He informed international Jewish leaders that "an asylum is prepared and hereby offered to them (the Jewish people) where they can enjoy that peace, comfort and happiness which have been denied to them through the intolerance and misgovernment of former ages."

One rabbinical authority branded Noah a charlatan and – according to a Buffalo newspaper of the day – "demanded authentification of the prophetic text which points out a marsh in North America as the spot for re-assembling the scattered remains of Israel."

A city of 400 hectares

Noah envisioned levying a small tax on all Jews for the maintenance of Ararat. He also wanted to establish a modern Sanhedrin "in which the affairs of the Jewish nation will be principally discussed." His model was the 70-person Sanhedrin, the supreme court of the ancient Jewish nation, as well as the modern counterpart that Napoleon Bonaparte had dramatically reconvened in Paris in 1806, less than two decades earlier.

Ararat was to be a city of 400 hectares built on the southeastern section of the 124 sq.km. island. Noah's plan was to divide the city into 1,000 even lots and sell them for $100 each to cover the isle's purchase price. The land certainly was about to rise greatly in value, as Noah had foreseen, because of its proximity to the western terminus of the newly built Erie Canal.

On Sept. 15, 1825, Noah presided over a ceremony in which he dedicated a cornerstone for his dream city in the wilderness. Crowds hoping to witness the historic event lined the shores of the Niagara River, but the river had been too difficult to cross, so the event was moved at the last minute to St. Pauls' Episcopal Church in Buffalo.

The Buffalo Emporium headlined the story, "Revival of the Jewish Government."

The large cornerstone prepared for the dedication ceremony was inscribed: "ARARAT – A City of Refuge for the Jews Founded by Mordecai Manuel Noah, in the month of Tizri 5586, Sept. 1825, & in the 50th year of American independence."

The cornerstone was the only part of Noah's dream to become concrete. After the failure of his plan, he turned his energies toward the establishment of a Jewish state in Palestine.

Today, a large Holiday Inn stands on the site of his proposed Jewish Utopia, across the river from what is now the Buffalo suburb of Tonawanda.

Visitors to Buffalo interested in local Jewish history may also wish to visit the Cofeld Judaic Museum at Temple Beth Zion, 805 Delaware Ave., 716-886-7150.

Fund supports Jewish film

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO – Some 300 people gathered recently at the Royal Ontario Museum (ROM) to celebrate Jewish filmmaking in Canada at a gala screening and reception sponsored by the Leah Fund.

The gala was the Canadian premier of the full-length version of Francine Zuckerman's latest film, Punch Me in the Stomach, starring Deb Filler, a story about the family of one Holocaust survivor. A shortened version of the film was broadcast on CBC in March.

Videos of films by Cayle Chernin – In the Shadows (about Syrian Jewry) and Uncle Boris and My Russian Relatives – and Karen Shopsowitz's two-award-winning films – My Grandparents Had a Hotel and A place to Save Your Life (about Jews in Shanghai) – were shown at the reception following the featured screening. All three filmmakers have received support from the Leah Fund.

The keynote speaker was Irving Abella, past president of Canadian Jewish Congress, and a board member of Vision TV. He stressed the importance of Jewish film in depicting the role of Jewish people in Canadian history and praised the Leah Fund for being a catalyst in the creation of several important Jewish films.

The endowment fund, created in memory of Lillian Shopsowitz following her death in 1984, was established to encourage film and video projects pertaining to Jewish life.

"I think it's essential to document our history in video and film for our children and their children," said her son Noah at the gala.

For more information on the Leah Fund, call Noah Shopsowitz at 785-1135.

Eye on Arts

by Bill Gladstone

Literary Affairs

• Far-right xenophobia has raised its ugly head and intruded into cultural affairs in France. Jean-Marie le Chevallier, mayor of the town of Toulon, recently vetoed the participation of the French Jewish writer Marek Halter as a guest of honor at the city's book fair. Organizers of the fair had intended to honor Halter for his new book The Messiah.

According to a report in the London Jewish Chronicle, le Chevallier, a member of Jean-Marie Le Pen's National Front, lashed out on French TV against Halter's "internationalist vision," saying he was "not attached to a nation or a national soil."

While the Polish-born Halter complained of the mayor's "devastating" comments, he said he would still attend the fair, and several French political leaders indicated they would make a show of support for him.

Meanwhile, the town prepared to honor ex-actress Brigitte Bardot, who recently published her memoirs.

• Several momentous works by Irish novelist James Joyce have been translated into Hebrew. The books include Ulysses, Portrait of the Artist as a Young Man and Dubliners. Joyce always had an interest in the Jews, as evidenced by the fact that Leopold Bloom, the lead character of Ulysses, was an Irish Jew.

Music & Drama

• A&E at the JCC, an eclectic evening of literary readings, dance, film, comedy and music, is set for Thursday Dec. 12, 7:30 p.m., Bloor JCC. Participants include Stuart Ross, Omo Dance Company, Morley Torgov, Ellen Besen and Ronna Bloom. Non- members $6, members $4. 416-924-6211.

• The Broadway musical phenomenon Rent, written by Jonathan Larson, makes its Canadian premiere in Toronto at the Royal Alex in November 1997. Its Toronto producers are David and Ed Mirvish. It is scheduled to play here for 20 weeks before moving to Vancouver.

Film News

• The Champage Safari, a documentary feature film by Toronto artist-animator George Ungar, opened in November at a cinema in Manhattan, and both film and filmmaker were the subject of a thoughtful article in the New York Jewish newspaper Forward. The film, which took Ungar nearly two decades and some $500,000 to make, focuses on an obscure and enigmatic figure, Charles Bedaux.

A flamboyant industrialist, Bedaux went on a lavish safari in British Columbia in 1934, and later became a Nazi collaborator in Europe.

However, Ungar asserts Bedaux, who died under mysterious circumstances in 1944, wasn't a Nazi ideologue. "His collaboration was similar to that of Oskar Schindler, who also played both sides. But unlike Schindler, who ended up a hero, Bedaux got caught."

Media Watch

• From The Right is a new right-wing journal of Canadian politics, now available on news-stands. Its editor-publisher is Michael Taube, a writer and former student of political studies and economics. According to neocon guru David Frum, the paper "is an exciting and important new venture, at a critical juncture in Canadian history."

Awards & Prizes

• Tourism Toronto, the city's official tourism sales and marketing organization, has named Livent chief Garth Drabinsky as the 1996 Tourism Person of the Year, citing his "unparalleled role in positioning Toronto as a dynamic performing arts destination. Through his efforts, tens of thousands of people have visited our city."

Now in previews, Livent's production of Ragtime opens Dec. 8 at the Ford Centre, North York.

• Toronto-area harpist Erica Goodman was recently named Best Classical Musician by a readers' poll conducted by Now magazine. Goodman, who shared the honor with pianist Anton Kuerti, has performed extensively in Europe, Japan and the United States this past year. She is due to perform with the Canadian Opera Company this month at the Ford Centre.

Concert celebrates Jerusalem 3000

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to the CJN

MARKHAM, Ont. — A crowd of diplomats, MPPs, mayors, town councilors and other notables filled the 400-seat Markham Theatre for the Performing Arts recently for a concert featuring award-winning Israeli musicians Vadim Gluzman and Angela Yoffe, a violinist and pianist, respectively.

A young and vibrant husband-and-wife musical team, Gluzman and Yoffe have performed frequently throughout the United States and Europe, particularly in New York, where they are temporarily based. Sponsored by Joey and Toby Tanenbaum, their Markham recital was presented jointly by Markham Mayor Donald Cousens and Israeli Consul-General Jehudi Kinar, and came near the end of a brief Canadian musical tour.

Commemorating the Jerusalem 3000 anniversary, the concert featured numerous works with Judaic themes. The highlight was the Canadian premiere of Tefillah (Prayer) for violin solo, composed by 23-year-old L. Auerbach. The programme also featured composers A. Schnittke, C. Franck, E. Ysaye, E. Bloch and M. Castelnuovo-Tedesco.

"I hope we've started a tradition," Kinar remarked before the music got under way. "For my part, I promise we will not wait another 3,000 years to put on such a celebration."

Cousens, who visited Israel earlier this year, announced the city of Markham has designated a permanent Jerusalem 3000 Rose Garden, which will be established in the spring.

"Markham council unanimously endorsed the project," he said. "The Jerusalem garden will signify the importance of this anniversary while honoring the extraordinary city of Jerusalem."

Paralleling their rich musicality, Gluzman and Yoffe have outstanding musical credentials. Born in Zitomir, Ukraine, Gluzman has appeared with major symphony orchestras throughout Europe and North America after winning accolades from Yehudi Menuhin, Isaac Stern and other prime violinists.

Yoffe, a native of Riga, Latvia, has received top prizes in many competitions and festivals, and together with her husband has recorded a CD with Koch International.

Guests included MPP Monte Kwinter, Attorney-General Charles Harnick, cellist Ofra Harnoy, and consul-generals from more than 20 countries, including Britain, Greece, China, Togo and Cyprus.

"We're delighted to expose the Canadian community to Israeli culture," said Alisa Siegel, a representative of the Israeli consulate responsible for cultural affairs. "We were really interested in bringing these two young Israeli musicians to Canada."

Besides Markham, the musical duo also played in Calgary, Edmonton and London

Jewish wedding performed on stage

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to the CJN

TORONTO — At a Jewish wedding performed here recently, Harvey, the top-hatted groom, stopped the proceedings to scrutinize the ketubah before signing it.

"What does all this mean in English?" he asked warily, examining the Hebrew document as everybody waited.

"Don't worry about it, you can read the fine print later," came the stern reply. Then, after he had signed it, he was told: "It means you're giving up all your worldly goods, among other things...and, according to Jewish law, you have to ransom her in case of kidnapping."

On this day, Harvey's caution seemed appropriate, since he had met the white-veiled bride, Naomi, just 10 minutes earlier.

The occasion was The Wedding Project, a participatory theatrical event exploring the traditions of the East European Jewish wedding, that was performed at the Morris Winchevsky Centre three times over a recent weekend.

It began when Allan Merovitz, the Toronto-based Yiddishist performer, chose de kalle (bride) and der chosn (groom), then cast a variety of secondary roles such as mispoches (families), machatonim (in-laws), gests and fraynts (guests and friends) from among audience members, who had paid $10 apiece for the privilege.

The festivities were enlivened almost continuously with klezmer music played by clarinetist Martin Van de Ven and accordionist Alexandr Luminsky.

Taking their cue from Merovitz – a spritely full-bearded gentleman dressed in a bright red jacket – the musicians were also dressed theatrically in bright clothes, recognizing their roles as key players in a recurring drama of Jewish life.

For the kalle bezetsn, the seating of the bride, Naomi was seated on a white throne because, Merovitz explained, "On her wedding day the kalle is a queen." Dancing before her, her three friends methodically wove a large braid from strands of fabric, entwining "their best hopes and dreams."

The Bazingn di Kalle, the Sad Song for the Bride, seemed like something out of vaudeville or commedia dell'arte, as Merovitz and others produced oversized, brightly colored handkerchiefs and feigned an exaggerated weeping.

"Oy!" he sobbed. "Seeing this young innocent girl, making the transition to womanhood! This is the saddest event that these two will ever experience!"

After the groom covered the bride's face (Badekn de Kalle), the men danced around her seven times; then the women circled the groom (Arum der Chosn). Two candles were lit and their flames brought together. As they touched, Merovitz – who seemed equal parts rabbi, magician and special-effects artist – they produced a momentary fireball.

Next came the chuppe (the marriage canopy "symbolizing the temporariness of life"), the blessing on the wine, the rings, the vows.

"The rabbis insisted the rings be made of plain metal so poor couples wouldn't be embarrassed...even a garbage-bag twist-tie will do."

As at a genuine wedding, the crowd sang out mazel-tov and the music reached a frenzy. Typically, Naomi shrieked and steadied herself by holding onto the shoulders of those lifting her in a chair (Chosn, Kalle). As the dancing commenced, Merovitz danced briefly with bent knees, kicking energetically in the Russian style. Then he kissed the bride.

"Everybody loves a wedding!" exclaimed Eileen Chudnovsky, a paying guest. Born in a shtetl, she had come to Canada as a child and had been married at the former Hebrew Men of England Synagogue 51 years ago, she told The CJN.

"My mother once told me that the wedding was the most happy event in the town – it meant that everyone would be fed," she said as her 4-year-old granddaughter, Emily Chudnovsky, tugged her toward the refreshment table.

All in all, it was a hearty simchah. Merovitz has been invited to stage The Wedding Project at the upcoming second International Yiddish Festival in Amsterdam.

Klezmer band preserves music of the past

By SYLVIA BROOKE
Special to the CJN

TORONTO — In keeping with the spirit of Chanukah, the klezmer band Brave Old World featured supporting band on Itzhak Perlman In the Fiddler's House, performs at Beth Tikvah Synagogue, Dec. 8.

Brave Old World lead singer and violinist, Michael Alpert, was among a group of young American Jews in the 1970s, who sought to revive the sounds of the old country. They interviewed musicians, reviewed old records and tapped into their family memories. They were able to develop a type of music that is still thriving.

Alpert, who grew up in a Yiddish-speaking home, is comfortable both composing and performing in Yiddish. The group's musical director Alan Bern is touted as a leader of the accordion revival in the United States. Kurt Bjorling brings an unmatched passion to the song of his clarinet, and the multi-talented Stuart Brotman accompanies on bass, wind and fretted instruments, percussion and the little-known cimbalom.

The band strives to preserve the music of the past, including never-before or rarely heard pieces, such as Songs Of the Lodz Ghetto. What sets them apart from other klezmer bands is their ability to bring current or non-traditional themes into their melodies, as in Alpert's composition, Chernobyl.

The concert is a joint effort of the Committee for Yiddish, Jewish Music-Toronto and Beth Tikvah Synagogue.

Tickets are available at Israel's, Matana, Aleph Bet, Miriam's or Negev Judaica centres. Call Jerry Nesker, 510-1888, ext. 230; Koffler Centre for the Arts, 636-1880, ext. 299, or Beth Tikvah at 221-3433.

Business Profile

David Mirvish:

Mirvish Productions launches "ambitious project"

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to the CJN

TORONTO – Impresario David Mirvish has become one of the most prominent figures in Canadian theatre since taking the helm of the family entertainment business 10 years ago.

His impressive list of accomplishments includes the production of award-winning musicals like Les Miserables and Crazy for You, the construction of the 2,000-seat Princess of Wales Theatre and the promotion of Canadian theatrical talent.

Now there's a new feather in Mirvish's showbiz cap. He has just produced his first original musical — Jane Eyre. The show, based on the 19th-century classic by Charlotte Bronte, had its world premier at the Royal Alexandra Theatre this week and is scheduled to move to Broadway in the fall of next year.

In a recent interview at Mirvish Productions headquarters on King Street, Mirvish, 52, said going through the birth pangs of an original show — he referred to Jane Eyre as his baby — has been a thrilling experience.

He's convinced that the show is "a winner," noting that it has attracted some major talent, including three Tony-award winners — director John Caird, male lead Anthony Crivello and set designer John Napier.

"We have assembled an extraordinary cast," Mirvish said. "The lure of knowing that you're going to originate a new role on Broadway is extremely attractive to performers."

The staging of Jane Eyre marks a "new creative level" for Mirvish Productions, he said. "This is really the most ambitious project we've undertaken."

Mirvish, who was made a member of the Order of Canada last February, began his career as an art dealer in 1963, exhibiting and collecting the works of some of the most important contemporary abstract expressionist painters until he closed the David Mirvish Gallery in 1978.

Although he still considers himself an art dealer —his personal collection is worth millions— he said he was not interested in selling art as a livelihood. He joined the family entertainment business because he thought it would be a more productive way of earning a living, he explained.

David Mirvish founded Mirvish Productions in 1986.

His entrepreneurial father Edwin Mirvish of Honest Ed's fame, purchased the Royal Alex in 1962 and staged travelling American and British shows for subscription series. He also acquired the Old Vic in London some 20 years later.

The younger Mirvish formed Mirvish Productions in 1986 – today it is one of the largest live entertainment companies in the country – to create a connection between the two family-owned theatres.

He took charge of the programming for both theatres and began producing his own shows rather than booking the travelling Broadway shows. Producing gave him more control over the quality of the productions, he said.

Mirvish showcased Canadian and international productions for Royal Alex subscribers until 1989, when he shifted his focus to the co-production of long-running megahit musicals like Les Miz and Miss Saigon.

"We felt that the subscribers wanted to see the most successful, the most engaging musicals that existed," he said.

Many of the key roles in these productions were given to local actors, because Mirvish strongly believes in supporting Canadian talent he said. "I always look to hire our people. They have to be at least as good or better than [their Broadway counterparts]. I look to include us first because I'm part of us."

The musicals were expensive to mount and had to run longer than the subscription plays to justify the expense, Mirvish said, noting that Jane Eyre, "will have a life after Toronto," because like the other large-scale musicals, it needs an extended run to recoup the initial $6-million investment.

Construction on The Princess of Wales Theatre, located on King Street just west of the Royal Alex, was completed in 1993. Built for $22 million, the new theatre, whose inaugural production was Miss Saigon, is the first privately owned free-standing theatre to be built anywhere in North America in more than 30 years.

With the Princess of Wales Theatre designed as a venue for long-running shows — today it houses Disney's Beauty and the Beast —the Royal Alex was able to revert back to its "traditional subscription role," a format conducive to launching original musicals like Jane Eyre, Mirvish said.

"We're now working three or four years ahead on new musicals. We can do a series of dramatic plays and have one new musical in the season in which we can end up owning world rights and which we can look to take further beyond Toronto."

While having the world rights to a successful show can be a very lucrative business proposition, Mirvish said money was not his main motivation for backing Jane Eyre: The project was "the most exciting" new pre-production theatre work he'd seen in five years, he said.

Jane Eyre is the brainchild of Los Angeles-based pop song writer Paul Gordon. He started composing the music and lyrics in 1991 and after recording some songs with cast members from Les Miz, Gordon was able to interest Les Miz director John Caird in the project, Mirvish said.

"When John heard the music, he was very excited because he thought he had found a new original voice in the theatre."

The show was further developed in workshops in New York City and Wichita, Kansas, with Mirvish Productions getting involved about a year ago when 90 percent of the show was completed, Mirvish noted.

In the market for an original production he attended a workshop in Wichita and was "very taken" by what he saw, he said. "John and Paul were telling a story I wanted to hear."

His decision to help bankroll the project was based on intuition rather than formal market research, he explained. "I feel I have pretty good intuition. I've had more successes than failures."

As the producer , Mirvish did not interfere in the artistic direction of Jane Eyre, but said he envisions himself taking a more hands-on role in the creative process when future projects go into production.

He said he currently has several projects on the go: Sir Peter Hall, the artistic director of the Old Vic is in the midst of forming a repertory company and he will be staging 11 plays in 40 weeks; auditions for the February production at the Royal Alex of Death of a Salesman, starring Judd Hirsch were just completed; auditions for the fall production at the Royal of Rent, which Mirvish called "the most exciting show on Broadway," will start next month; and he's getting ready to announce the Broadway debut of Two Pianos Four Hands, the Canadian show to which he acquired world rights.

Mirvish declined to discuss figures pertaining to the specific earnings of the various productions.

And while he indicated a preference for discussing the esthetics of Jane Eyre, he was quick to acknowledge that seat sales — some 130,000 tickets have to be sold during the show's three-month Toronto run — are the ultimate indicator of a show's success.

But the public will not be lured to the theatre by a glitzy advertising campaign, Mirvish said. "With this show we have taken the attitude that you cannot buy the audience... You hope you'll touch their hearts in some way.

"It's really going to be a question of people going in and telling 10 friends. Word of mouth is what will make a success of this show."

Happy Chanukah

The candles and their glow are at the centre

The holiday of Chanukah tugs at the imagination of children perhaps more than any other holiday. The reasons are not too hard to understand.

There are a great many fun parts to Chanukah: the spin of the dreidel, the exchange of gelt - real or chocolate - the delicious latkes and the sweet, fluffy sufganiot, perhaps even a gift or two.

But the real reason is the glow of the candles. Apart from the Shabbat, there is no other holiday where the beautiful glow of candles is at the centre. And, as we all know, there is hardly anything as captivating as watching the "magical" glow from the orange, blue and white of the candles' flames.

The photos on this page show us the "magic" in action.

Below we see a young boy concentrating on the very last candle of the chanukiyah. To the right we see Yaacov Tsabari, his wife Sada and their infant daughter lighting the Chanukah candles for the very first time in their new home in Israel. They have just arrived from Yemen. The baby's eyes are firmly fixed on the candle in her father's hands. To the far right, we see young Dor, also transfixed by the flame, pointing to the candle as if to touch it.

Happy Chanukah to all the children and their families.

Everything about Jewish holidays-even riddles!

By LEILA SPEISMAN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO – Let's face it, books that talk about all the Jewish holidays can be very boring - they often seem to say the very same things.

The Kids' Catalog of Jewish Holidays, by David Adler (Jewish Publication Society, 1996) is different. Oh, it talks about the meaning of the holy days, and their customs and histories, like all the rest, but there is so much more.

For each holy day , there are stories that illustrate one of the morals of the holiday, recipes, jokes, arts and crafts, poems and pictures.

For instance, in the chapter about Chanukah, you can read about Chanukah in Yemen, in a European village and in a Nazi concentration camp, learn two tunes to Moaz Tzur, and make menorahs out of acorns or bottle caps, and a dreidl out of paper. There are even riddles.

In other parts of the book, you can learn how to make your very own spice ball for Havdalah, get ideas for Purim costumes, find a reading list about the Holocaust, and get recipes for Rosh Hashanah carrot tzimmes and Israeli pita sandwiches for Yom Ha'atzmaut.

Some of the stories will make you cry, some of the stories and certainly the riddles, comics and jokes will make you laugh. But you will certainly want to read the book over and over again.

U of T centre would probe Nazi medicine's 'legacy'

By RON CSILLAG
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO – As a doctor and teacher of medical students, Dr. William Seidelman is troubled by the fact that many physicians have little if any grounding in the horrific role medicine has played in history, particularly before and during the Holocaust.

Seidelman feels that doctors today aren't fully aware of the many complex ethical issues that arose from Nazi Germany, and that they continue to suffer ethical lapses.

His plan to counter that is to establish a Centre for the Study of Medicine and the Holocaust at the University of Toronto's Faculty of Medicine. Combining research, curriculum development and teaching, the centre – a first in the world if approved – would foster the study of Nazi medicine, and what Seidelman calls its "continuing legacy."

It's his contention that in the past 50 years, there have been "recurring" violations of the codes of conduct that arose from the Nuremberg trials of Nazi war criminals – including 23 doctors. The vulnerable – patients, prisoners, visible minorities, children in institutions, women and soldiers have all been "exploited" for medical experimentation.

How, Seidelman asks, can supposedly caring, compassionate professionals be co-opted by the state to harm? And why today do "the powerful appear to have forgotten the innocent?"

In October, Seidelman, who teaches at U of T's medical school and directs the HIV Ambulatory Program at Wellesley Hospital, addressed a conference in Nuremberg. In his speech to the German chapter of International Physicians for the Prevention of Nuclear War, he spoke of his profession's "moral culpability" in its failure to address the ethical dilemmas that arose from the Third Reich. Particularly, he called doctors to task for sidestepping, even ignoring, the lessons of the Holocaust with their belief that it was only a few evil practitioners who carried out Hitler's will, and that the lessons of Nuremberg are no longer relevant.

Seidelman can point to several modern examples of doctors becoming tools of oppression and cruelty: In Canada in the 1930s and '40s, hundreds of mentally handicapped people were forcibly sterilized. In the 1950s, the CIA used human guinea pigs to test LSD. The leader of the Bosnian Serbs, Radovan Karadzic, who has been indicted on war crimes, is a psychiatrist. And on another level, around the world, the debate over genetic selection and doctor-assisted suicide rages.

Dr. William Seidelman

Seidelman even uses the cuts to Ontario's health care system as an example of the conflicting interests of the physician and the state.

But the main focus at the proposed centre at U of T will be Nazi Germany, where it was doctors who did the state's bidding when it came to propagating theories of racial purity, fanatical hygiene and eugenics (the science of improving a population by controlled breeding). It was also the role of doctors to select so-called "inferiors" for forced sterilization. And even before the war, it was doctors who helped carry out the state-sanctioned murder (officially called "The Euthanasia Program") of thousands of physically and mentally handicapped – "undesirables" and those "unfit for life."

It all set the stage for the gas chambers and crematoria to come.

In the death camps, doctors carried out pseudo-medical experiments on inmates, injecting them with dyes, subjecting them to freezing and infecting them with cancer and contagions to try out new drugs. Corpses of victims were often shipped to German medical schools for use as specimens.

Not to mention one infamous doctor – Josef Mengele, the "Monster of Auschwitz" – who performed inhuman experiments on camp inmates, notably on twins.

In the Third Reich, society's healers succumbed to evil.

It's an uneasy contrast: Germany is the birthplace of modern medical science and the German medical school served as the prototype for all others. But today, German medical classes shy away from the Holocaust period. "In Germany, this subject is taboo," Seidelman told The CJN. "If a German academic doesn't want to advance his career, he pursues this."

In Austria, two universities still rely on a classic anatomy atlas in which the cadavers portrayed are believed to be victims of Nazi terror. Yad Vashem in Israel has asked the schools to investigate.

Seidelman feels that if doctors are expected to do the right thing, they must first learn that moral obligations come with the power and privilege of the job, and learn too how to respond to "institutional abuses."

Even medical schools outside Germany have "tiptoed" around the issue, he adds. While courses in bioethics are offered, there has never been an organized approach to developing study of the subject.

The Centre for the Study of Medicine and the Holocaust proposed by Seidelman and his colleague, Dr. Edward Shorter, a U of T professor of the history of medicine, would work with other institutes, notably, Yad Vashem, the U.S. Holocaust Memorial Museum, and various medical schools. Experts in German history and the Holocaust would also be utilized.

Plans call for it to develop a curriculum for use in medical schools everywhere, put together a bibliography and, at U of T, teach the subject in the Faculty of Medicine and interested departments.

It all adds up, Seidelman says, to a need "to address basic issues that challenge the very core of medical practice and behavior."

Can I ever feel happy again?
Will I ever stop feeling this pain?
Will my life ever hold real meaning again?

CHAT grad scores big as York shooting guard

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — There isn't much glamor playing women's college basketball, even if it's at the varsity level. Sure, you get to go on road-trips and visit some charming cities, like Montreal, but most of what you see is through the windows of a bus.

Still, Dena Weinroth isn't complaining. In her second season with the York University Yeowomen, she's enjoying the camaraderie and family-like feeling she gets being with her teammates, not to mention the rush she gets playing basketball.

Weinroth, 20, is a 5-foot-6, 130-pound "off guard" who plays mostly in a backup role. A deadly shooter, Weinroth's confidence has improved over last year and so has her playing time.

"It was disappointing [last season], but you have to put the team first," she said. "I think I'm playing more than last year. I've got more experience than last year."

No longer as intimidated by the top players in the league, Weinroth feels "I have a lot more confidence now. I feel I can play at this level. I've also improved my shooting."

In addition to making the team on her first try, Weinroth went on to be named CIAU Academic All-Canadian last year by combining an "A" average in kinesiology and health issues with her courtside prowess.

The Yeowomen, ranked eighth in the country, tip off against teams from McMaster, U of T, Ryerson, Queen's, McGill, Concordia, Laval, Bishop's and Laurentian.

Short of the national team, it's the elite of women's basketball in Canada and for Weinroth, it comes as the culmination of many years of training and hard work.

Back when she was 10, she and her two brothers and sister convinced their parents, Judith and Simeon, to set up a basketball hoop. Her older sister, Eva, introduced her to competitive basketball at the former Jewish Community Centre (JCC) on Bathurst, where she played in the house league. In fact, when she started there, she was the only girl playing on the coed basketball team.

In high school, she played for the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto (CHAT) Tigers girls team in their TDCAA league games against Roman Catholic schools and in 1994 she was named CHAT female athlete of the year for her all-round abilities in basketball, volleyball and softball.

During those years, she and other CHATniks who played at the JCC represented Toronto at the Youth Maccabi games in Detroit, New Jersey, Pittsburgh and Baltimore. They had a very good team and won the silver in Jersey and the gold medal in Pittsburgh in 1993.

Weinroth credits her coach at the JCC, Sy Herling, with teaching her the fundamentals along with Aubrey Zimmerman, a CHAT alumnus who coaches at the Jewish high school.

While Weinroth was finishing high school and competing in the Maccabi Games, her sister Eva was playing for the varsity team at York between 1990 and 1994 along with another CHAT grad, Michelle Sund.

Weinroth hopes she too can serve as an inspiration and role model for other Jewish girls and young women who aspire to excel in sports and schooling.

CHAT CHAMPS

The class of 1989 were winners of a CHAT alumni tournament held at the Bathurst Jewish Centre recently. The tournament raised over $2,000 towards funding the eight-team Israel Becker CHAT Invitational Basketball Tournament, which will be held in December in memory of the late CHAT student who was killed in an auto accident. Teams from Toronto, Winnipeg, Montreal, New York and Boston are expected to attend. The '89 alumni beat the '90 team by a score of 58-43. Shown here is the winning team. Top row from left: Hart Heller, Jeff Rafael, Paul Weinberger, Morley Conn, Elliott Birnboim, Rich Kaminker and Howard Buckstein. Bottom row from left: Mike Tylman and Jay Heller.

Anti-racism symposium held

By MAURICE LUCOW
CJN Western Correspondent

CRESTON, B.C. — British Columbia is creating "a new world order," one where there is zero tolerance for hatred, said Attorney General Ujjal Dosanjh, at an anti-racism symposium here.

Speaking to an audience of about 200, Dosanjh promised that groups or individuals with complaints about hate activities will be able to use B.C.'s civil rights law and his ministry will help prepare the necessary legal action.

He said civil rights legislation is a "neglected" piece of law which "we are eager to use...I am anxious for individuals or groups to look at that legislation so that you can begin an action that we would dearly love to become part of."

The prospect of the attorney general's joining the fight against racism alongside an individual or community "will give tremendous support to people who feel victimized," said Peter Ashmore, chair of the Creston Valley Human Rights Coalition (CVHRC). "It takes the burden off the individual."

A segment of the symposium was broadcast on the CBC. In a studio interview after the show, Dosanjh described the town of Creston and a large part of southeastern B.C. and northern Idaho as a hotbed for hatred in which some residents "cower in the shadows."

Dosanjh, who was himself beaten in the 1980s as a victim of hate-motivated violence, said the fear of racism is palpable in the Creton area.

Commenting on a CBC report that suggested U.S. militia-style training is going on in the nearby mountains, Dosanjh said it's important "that we don't hear the sounds of the militia and the guns training in the wilderness around here."

The symposium included talks by Holocaust survivors Bronia Sonnenschein and Robbie Waisman, both of Vancouver, who were introduced by Sandy Bore of the B.C. Teachers Federation.

Sonnenschein said the only way to prevent another Holocaust is to remind people of what happens when hate is allowed to run freely through the streets and people's minds.

"I don't ever want my grandchildren called dirty Jews," Waisman said.

Both speakers told of their experiences in Hitler's camps.

The symposium was moderated by Marilyn Berger, associate director of Canadian Jewish Congress Pacific region. The symposium was organized by CJC-P and the anti-racism educational outreach project of Multicultural B.C.

Jewish kids hit the right note

By LEILA SPEISMAN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO – Move over, Avraham Fried and Yehuda – you have competition.

Well, maybe it will be a few years before Koleinu Tishma catches up, but the group, comprised of David Gellman, 11; Avigail Gellman, 9; Michael Simkin, 10; and Haya Simkin, 8, has made a great start.

A composition they wrote, a new melody for Psalm 118, Hodu LaShem, was performed by the well-known Amadeus Choir on Dec. 1, at the Recital Hall of the Ford Centre for the Performing Arts. Koleinu Tishma will be invited on stage, and will receive a certificate and a small cash award.

It all began last summer, when the four youngsters, who have been friends for three years, were playing together during Kiddush after services at Or Chaim Yeshiva. Being musical (David and Avigail are in the Netivot HaTorah choir, and play clarinet and recorder respectively, and Michael and Haya play piano) and being very influenced by such popular Jewish singing groups, they decided to write a song that they could sing at the bar mitzvah of the oldest Gellman, Shai.

"We wanted to write something that was not too sleepy, but not too lively either," explained Avigail.

Their presentation was a smash success, and when they read about the annual Amadeus Choir Chanukah and Christmas song competition in The CJN, mother Elana Simkin, wrote the music on a music score, and they submitted it.

Last week, the four children had the opportunity to hear the choir rehearse their song. "It was like a dream," agreed Haya and Avigail.

The bond between Haya and Avigail is stronger than mere friendship. Haya is blind, and Avigail is her "sighted guide," explained mothers Elana Simkin and Eli Gellman. It will be Avigail who helps Haya onto the Ford Centre Recital Hall stage to be honored.

Avigail has also learned to read English and Hebrew braille, and she, Haya, Elana and Eli "daven together in braille. It's a group effort," laughed Elana.

Not that Haya is in the slightest inhibited about her disability. "I'm blind and I have perfect pitch," she announced enthusiastically.

The Simkins, originally from Vancouver, made aliyah 10 years ago. They came to Toronto three years ago, in an effort to get expert medical care for Haya. The Gellmans came to Toronto from Calgary, so that the children could get a Jewish education, Eli Gellman said.

Koleinu Tishma has already started writing another song, which they hope to enter in next year's competition.

Koleinu Tishma is not the only Jewish winner of the Amadeus song writing competition: 13- year-old Rachelle Magil won in the Child class, and Kerry Wilson and Bruce Silburt of Guelph won in the unpublished group class.

POTATO APPLE LATKES juice from half a lemon

6 medium baking potatoes
2 large or 3 small Granny Smith apples (not peeled)
1 small yellow onion
2 eggs
3 tblsp flour or matzah meal
1/2 tsp baking powder
1/2 tsp salt
fresh ground pepper to taste oil for frying

Fill large bowl with ice water and squeeze in lemon juice. Grate potatoes and apple in food processor, putting them into the water as you grate them. Peel and grate the onion and set aside. Mix eggs, flour, baking powder, salt and pepper. Drain potatoes and apples in colander. Wrap in a clean dishtowel and squeeze to get out as much liquid as possible. Put potatoes and apples back in bowl. Stir in egg mixture and onion until combined. If mixture looks watery, add a little more flour.

Heat oil in pan. Use 1/4 cup mixture for each latke. Fry over medium-high heat until one side is brown and begins to get crispy. Turn and brown the other side. Remove to a plate lined with paper towels to drain. Serve warm with applesauce or sour cream.

About families

Dear Susan,

My 11-year-old son is experiencing some problems in school. He has been underachieving as of late and his school guidance counselor has recommended that he seek counselling. What should I do? Do I consult a psychiatrist, psychologist or social worker? Please help.

Dear Reader,

I know it can be disconcerting to a parent to hear that your child is struggling. The guidance counselor should be commended for their kind attention and speedy identification of your son's struggle. As a conscientious parent you are doing the right thing by seeking counsel. The question you so clearly articulate is what type of counseling should it be?

Before you do anything else, it is important to take a step back and try to determine when this problem arose and what the contributing factors might have been. The answer to this question will help direct you to the appropriate professional.

If your child has a history of under achievement, I would gather up his report cards and consult with a psychologist about the possible explanation for these occurrences. A psychologist can offer a variety of tests which will determine if your child has a specific learning or attention difficulty. Personality testing will help you understand how your child views his place within the family and in the world at large.

If the psychologist feels your child would benefit from family therapy, he would likely refer you to a social worker. The social worker would try to understand the history of the problem and how family dynamics have possibly impeded this child's progress. The therapy should empower the child as well, as challenging the family to change certain dysfunctional patterns.

If the social worker or psychologist feel the child is suffering from a clinical depression, there are various therapies he could recommend, including play therapy. If the child continues to be depressed a psychiatric consultation may be in order. Persistent clinical depression can often only be successfully addressed by psychopharmaceutical means, and psychiatrists are the king pins of the pharmacological world.

As you can see, knowing where to turn can be as complicated as the problem itself. Find a knowledgeable person who can understand your child as an individual, as a student, and as a member of a community at large. The treatment is only as good as the practitioner so choose wisely.

Susan Leventhal is a family, marital and individual therapist, who has been practising for more than 17 years.

Chanukah 1944

There was no joy
No laughter, no hope
In the camp.
It was so cold
With snow on the ground
We stared bleakly at the flakes.

A murmur went Through the group
A murmur so low
It was Chanukah...
Memories drifted in our minds,
Warmth, candles, family

We need to celebrate
But how, no candles
Fear for the moment
And the next day
Someone said laces, shoe laces

We cut up a lace into nine
When sundown came
We got a flame
We held hands and watched
The larger lace, the shamash
Light the other eight.

We prayed and hoped
Oh Chanukah, the miracle of lights!

Sandra Giddens, adult

From Israel

I saw a son of Judah Maccabi today dressed in green and khaki at the central bus station.
On his way.

Hitching a ride on the Haifa Road rifle over shoulder – a modern archer.

Unwilling to admit or perhaps unaware of the legacy, they stand strong keeping the Ner Tamid burning bright, with hangers-on, basking in the warm light.

Guarding the light without pretense, with nonchalance, preserving us all.
Always on call,
These sons of Maccabi.

Jack Silverstone, adult

I remember

I remember,
we would light together.
When I was little, he would lift me up,
so we could light together.
He would tell me stories about ancient times,
and now it seems, he is ancient to me.
He has been gone for so long,
but yet it seems like he still lives.
Not only in my heart, but in my prayer as well.
When I light, I see him.
I have my fond memories of him,
that I will always carry with me.
Now as I touch the lit match to the candles,
I vow,
I will do like he did.
I will light with my children, and their children, and their children's children.
So they can carry memories of me throughout their life, like I will carry of him throughout mine.

Light in the Darkness

It was a bitter cold winter in Auschwitz, 1943,
Reb Yankele was thinking, "Oh no, what will be?"
Yankele was not worried about the below zero weather,
Nor was it the meagre food that he received that was making him tremble.

The approaching holiday of Chanukah was on his mind,
All he could think was, "One little candle, where will I find?"

A young boy of 14, David, had been watching Yankele's pain,
And he felt it was time to act, before Chanukah came.

Late one night, with the fierce wind blowing on David's face,
He crept to the kitchen, for a Jew – a forbidden place.

The next morning, David approached the elderly man,
With a candle and a match in his quivering hand.

"Here," whispered David lovingly, giving Yankele the treasure;
Yankele's face shone with joy and pleasure.

He thanked the young boy with tears streaming down his glowing face,
"May HaShem bless you, my boy, now I can celebrate Chanukah with grace."

On the eve of Chanukah, Yankele quietly called his fellow Jews together,
"It is time, my friends," he whispered with fervor.
He closed his eyes and began to sway,
His gentle voice could be heard as the blessings he did say.

After he lit the candle, not one Jew moved,
Everyone's eyes, to the rising flame, were glued.

And slowly, despite their condition,
They thanked HaShem for the miracles He had done on Chanukah for their nation.

"May this light," whispered Reb Yankele,
"Give us the strength to continue our fight!"

The Runaway Latka

I had a latka round and sweet
It was very very good to eat.
It had lots of fun playing on the ground
It even turned round and round.

But now it's not fun not fun anymore
Because it rolled out the door.
I followed it out the house
OH NO it got eaten by a mouse!!!!!

First I was mad.
Then I was sad.
But my Mom made more latkas
So I was glad.

The Lights

The Lights:
They are eternal
They are our past;
Our legacy.
Our future;
Our aspirations.

The Lights:
Burning forever
They are our hopes;
They are our dreams.
They are our life;
They are our essence.

The Lights:
Never dying
They are me;
They are you.
They are us;
They are the world.

The Lights:
Forever ablaze
They are our spirit;
They are the flame inside us all.

Adam Lazier, 12 years old.

Chanukah

Under the streets on Chanukah day
Families gathered their things and started to pray.
They wished to get out of the ghetto and be free
Like a strong and victorious Maccabee.
We tried to flee
We tried to fight
But the Germans managed to put out the light!
We couldn't take much more
Our hearts were so sore.
We waited
We waited
We were in so much pain.
But at last Chanukah night came
We were able to put aside the shame.
We lit the candles
And said amen.

Nicole Shomair, 10 years old

The Parts of Chanukah

Shining through the glass windows of the cheerfully glowing house

the stranger passes catching a glimpse of the eight tendrils of flame shining the happiness of the holiday

we now celebrate the dreidel

with its mysterious Hebrew letters carved into the polished wood

it turns and spins in its brief moment of life

it wobbles to a halt falling on its side revealing the letter that will determine the victor

the laughter of children and the happy sighs of the parents the light of the chanukiyah and the spinning of the dreidel

all these take part in the creation of the holiday that is the favorite of so many.

Editorial

Well, it's come again. Winter, I mean.

Now, that shouldn't really come as much of a shock to us in Canada. After all, by December, we have had our first snowfall, cars have slid into ditches, and we have realized that we never did get around to replacing the kids' boots, because when spring came, we were so glad to see it, that we tossed the old ones down the basement just to get rid of the last snowflake.

But somehow, we always are astonished. How many of us have the squeegee ready for action and the warm gloves in our pockets before it really gets cold?

We sit around, grumbling that winter is coming, planning what we will do next spring and generally ignoring the speeding calendar.

And what happens when we can no longer deny that winter has come? We complain to our spouses, swear at the car and snarl at the kids to get those scarves on before they get pneumonia.

Maybe that's why we greet Chanukah so enthusiastically. Outside it may be snowing and blowing, but in our houses, there is light, wonderful foods and fam gatherings.

Sure, we always promise ourselves that we will cut down our entertaining, buy fewer and less elaborate presents, make latkes with egg whites and restrict ourselves to just one (or possibly two) sufganiot.

But we don't. And somehow, I don't think that it is merely because we are weak, just as I don't really think that we ignore the coming of winter completely out of wimpyness. (Well, maybe a little bit.)

Isn't it rather because in the middle of our complaining and gloom and doom attitude we basically have an optimistic streak? A core belief that life isn't really as bad as it appears?

Don't we look around as hard as we can for whatever goodness we can glean?

That's what the Maccabees did. When they managed to defeat (temporarily at least) the Syrian Greeks, who had not only tried their best to stamp out Jewish practice, but had defiled the Temple, the very centre of Jewish existence, they could be forgiven for feeling desolate.

But they didn't give in to that desolation. They cleaned the Temple and prepared to once again hold religious functions there. Even when they found only one flask of pure oil, they did not despair. In what the pagan world must have considered an act of supremely child-like faith, they lit that oil – and G-d responded to their faith by letting it burn for eight days.

Few nations have as much justification for losing hope as we Jews have. We have endured century after century of persecution, of attempts to destroy us both physically and spiritually.

Even now, when the nations of the world appear to be concentrating on causing as much havoc on each other instead of on us, we Jews appear to be turning on each other, a situation which may well prove more destructive than swords or guns.

Let us take the lesson of Chanukah to heart. Just as the Maccabees took a chance and burned that single cruse of oil, let each of us take the initiative to spread the warmth of this season to each other, to accept that all Jews are brothers and sisters, members of one family.

From all of us at The CJN, to all of you, a Chag Samayach, a wonderful and bright Chanukah. L.S.

Happy Chanukah

History records that Jews lived in the Netherlands as early as the 12th century and well into the 14th century. But in 1349 and 1350, the majority died in the Black Plague.

The significant Jewish presence in the Netherlands really begins in the late 16th century with the arrival of the "merchants" from Portugal. These merchants, of course, were Jews, among them a great number of Marranos, secret Jews, seeking a home for their families, a place for their worship and comfort for their conscience.

Approximately 200 years after their arrival in increasingly large numbers from Portugal, the Jews in the Netherlands were "emancipated" in the Napoleonic manner which characterized western continental Europe in the 19th century.

The CJN has asked Prof. Joseph Michman of the Hebrew University in Jerusalem, perhaps the world's most renowned authority on the Jews of the Netherlands, to write a brief history of this remarkable story.

It is a remarkable story too.

In the space allotted to him, Michman can only sketch its bare outline. But he has done so in very bold images. The vivid portrait that emerges from these pages has, alas, provided the background colors for the tableau we call Jewish history: expulsion, resettlement and regeneration.

Driven forward by the instinct for survival, they place their steps on paths that were set for them by the values and the traditions of their ancestors. They protect and defend and care for each other, building community institutions whose brick and mortar were, essentially, the notion that they were all responsible for each other's welfare and well-being.

Their story was, indeed, a remarkable one. We thank Michman for bringing it to our readers.

Throughout the article we have included drawings of the Jews of Amsterdam drawn by Rembrandt. They are excerpted from Rembrandt, The Jews and the Bible, Franz Landsberger, 1972, JPS.

The Sephardic Synagogue in Amsterdam, de Hooghe engraving

The Jews of Amsterdam

On Sept. 4, 1598, the council of burgomasters and ex-burgomasters of Amsterdam convened and decided that the Portuguese merchants residing in Amsterdam would be permitted to buy citizenship in the city providing they were Christians. But these merchants were also advised that no religious services would be permitted other than those held in churches.

What was behind this cryptic phrasing to the merchants? What prompted the local authorities to take this decision about Portuguese merchants? Two years earlier, Emanuel Rodrigues Vega had purchased citizenship in Amsterdam. Vega was a prominent businessman, in modern terms a multi-national. He traded with Portugal, Brazil and the Baltic lands, but he was also an entrepreneur and maintained relations with various heads of state. He came from Antwerp, where a colony of so-called New Christians, i.e. Marranos lived. However, since Antwerp had sided with the rebels against the Spanish king and was recaptured by the Spanish army in 1585, it rapidly fell into decline. Amsterdam now assumed Antwerp's former trading role and prospered greatly; within a short time it became the principal world trade centre.

Vega was a man after the burgomasters' heart: after all, they were wealthy, enterprising merchants, men of vision, who, in exchange for economic advantage, were willing to compromise. His international connections, especially with Spain and Portugal, could be of great benefit to the city. But the city's administrators had to be careful and take the sensibilities of the church council into consideration, since the latter firmly supported the monopoly of the Protestant, i.e. Calvinist church. What was Vega's creed? Was he, as a New Christian, Catholic or crypto-Jewish? Indeed Catholics too, in Amsterdam were forbidden to practise their religion in public. And of course, there were no Jews.

The burgomasters-merchants circumvented the problem with their carefully phrased invitation that clearly meant: Iberian merchants, you are most welcome here but do not provoke us on religious grounds. Vega's associates understood the message and many of them settled in Amsterdam.

What motivated them to undertake the risky move from Antwerp or from Portugal and even Spain to establish themselves in the young Amsterdam republic? Were they economic considerations, the expansion of their family-based trading houses? Or was the real reason they gave to Amsterdam the measure of personal freedom they could enjoy?

Scholars differ in their opinions on what compelled them to settle in Amsterdam. Presumably it was a combination of factors: Amsterdam offers more opportunities for trade than Antwerp, and it had a liberal administration. Thus, family members followed each other from Antwerp, the Iberian peninsula, Italy and the Ottoman empire.

Not more than five years after the decision taken by the city council, an organized Jewish community was formed in the city. In October 1603, the police raided a private home where a Jewish religious service was being conducted by Rabbi Uri Halevi, an Ashkenazi. When questioned, he declared that he had been living in Amsterdam for a year-and-a-half; had led religious services at his home on "Sabbaths, Passover, Sukkot and on Shavuot." He performed circumcisions and the functions of a shochet.

There is a story about R. Halevi that a number of Portuguese merchants who had arrived in Emden, aproached him for advice as to where to settle. He told them to go to Amsterdam if they wished to return to the Jewish faith. He accompanied them on their journey to teach them or reteach the ways of Judaism. After spending two months in prison he was released but, without any further complaint against him, by the authorities. The secret synagogue service thus attained a certain measure of legitimacy. Rabbi Halevi was permitted to set up a Jewish cemetery near Alkmaar in 1604. It had been forbidden to do so in Amsterdam.

In 1612, Amsterdam authorities permitted Jews to settle in the city, two Jewish communities were established: Beth Jacob and Neve Salom, both of which held synagogue services in private homes.

In this respect the situation of the Jews was the same as that of the Catholics, who had to make do with "clandestine churches." This was not to the liking of the proud, well-to-do Jewish merchants. They wanted official recognition of the Jewish faith as a quid pro quo for the economic benefits they could offer their new place of residence. If this was not possible in Amsterdam, they would try other towns. And indeed, they did receive offers to settle from Alkmaar, Haarlem (1604) and Rotterdam (1605), on condition, that a minimum number of families would accompany them into each town.

In the end, after repeated rejections, Amsterdam relented. The authorities turned a blind eye to the construction of a synagogue. In addition the energetic leaders also arranged for other vital needs of a kehillah: a Jewish school, Talmud Torah; a chebra for the sick: Bikur Holim, and also a society who's task it was to entice Jewish brides to move to Amsterdam (Dotar). All this took place in 1616. Fourteen years after the first clandestine synagogue services, the Amsterdam Sephardim had acquired all of the essential components of an established kehillah.

Benedictus (Baruch) Spinoza

The kehilla is finally established

Matters did not always run smoothly though. In 1618, conflict broke out in the Beth Jacob community, which was resolved by a civil judge, resulting in the establishment of a third community – Beth Israel. But even this conflict did not interfere with the cooperation between all of Amsterdam's Sephardim.

Undoubtedly the end of the truce in 1621 between Spain and Amsterdam and the renewed fighting between the two countries, contributed to this cooperation. For the Portuguese merchants, direct trade with the Iberian peninsula was still possible, although with great difficulty. However, as shrewd merchants they managed to find a solution. Instead of running their accounts through the Amsterdam exchange bank, after 1621, they banked from Hamburg, which was not at war with Spain.

Nevertheless, it appears that the communities found themselves in financial difficulties. In 1622, representatives of the three kehillot reached a decision of a far-reaching nature: a tax of one (pro mille) — the imposta — was levied on the import and export of goods handled by community members. From the records, it appears that the three communities engaged in a level of commerce that exceeded that of the famous East-India Company, and this from a community that in 1621 numbered about 2,300 persons.

The imposta also boosted close

United into one community

cooperation between the three communities and in the year 1639 they finally united into one community named "Talmud Torah." No longer were there three synagogues but rather one (Esnoga.)

Over the years, especially after the peace treaty of Munster in 1648, more Sephardim settled in Amsterdam. Eventually, they decided to build a large synagogue. In 1675, the magnificent Esnoga was inaugurated. It is an impressive building even today. It spread the return of Amsterdam's Portuguese Jews far and wide and attracted many highly placed visitors from other countries. The Portuguese Jews of Amsterdam had connections with many states and many of the merchants functioned as envoys, or representatives, of foreign powers. In 1609, Don Samuel Palache arrived in Amsterdam as envoy of the king of Morocco. He brought with him two Torah scrolls from Morocco, which were sold to the community after his death. Even Prince Maurits, the governor of Amsterdam, took part in the funeral procession to the Jewish cemetery.

The worldwide fame of Jewish Amsterdam was enhanced in no small way by the reputations of several prominent personalities. For example, the rebellious Uriel Acosta, denied the existence of the soul and was excommunicated by the community. The same fate befell Benedictus (Baruch) de Spinoza, who later led a quiet, spiritually creative life as a philospher.

As opposed to the religiously heretical school of thought, we also find individuals who advanced and developed the ideas of Orthodox Judaism, such as the kabbalist Abraham Cohen Herrera and the opponent of Spinoza; Isaac Orobio de Castro.

Menasseh ben Israel

In 1666, Amsterdam was also tensely awaiting news of the false Messiah Sabbatai Zevi. Many Amsterdam Jews, Sephardim and Ashkenazim, were already preparing to settle in the Holy Land.

However we should not forget that the historical stature enjoyed by these personalities today overshadows a very simple and noteworthy historical fact: the creation and the flourishing in Amsterdam, of a strong, pious kehillah prototype that served as a model for other Sephardi communities, such as in London and New York. From the very beginning the community provided spiritual Jewish leadership, first by the "imported" rabbis like Isaac Uziel from Morocco, Saul de Morteira and Joseph Pardo, both from Italy. But soon their own Talmud Torah supplied local rabbis such as Moseh Raphael de Aguilar and Izak Aboab de Fonseca, who inaugurated the great Esnoga. The most famous, if not the most erudite of all, was Menasseh ben Israel. He was friendly with Rembrandt and various Christian scholars. His efforts to open up England for the Jews during Cromwell's regime are well-known.

A rich, varied cultural life

A rich and varied Jewish cultural life developed in Amsterdam inspite of the strictly orthodox views, testifying to a liberal approach to literature and the arts. On the one hand there was the continued affinity to the old country, whose languages were practised in Amsterdam — Spanish for literary matters and Portuguese for daily use and for announcements in the Esnoga.

But Hebrew was also used. As a result of the teaching of Hebrew grammar, Amsterdam's Jews were able to continue the traditions of the Spanish Golden Age. Even before the revival of Hebrew literature during the period of the Haskala (Enlightenment), Amsterdam produced Hebrew poetry and plays. The most famous authors are Rabbi Selomo d'Oliveira and David Franco Mendes. In fact, when completing the study of a massechta in the gemara, festive gatherings were held, during which participants in the shiur (lesson) recited poems that they had written themselves.

Government circles of the Republic of the United Netherlands were very much aware of the economic contributions of the Portuguese Jews (as they were called, although there were many who had immigrated directly from Spain). Even after the singing of a peace treaty between the Republic and Spain, the Spanish government refused to recognize the Jewish merchants as subjects of the republic. If their ships were captured on the high seas, for example, this entailed serious financial losses to the Jews. They also ran the risk that they would be taken as prisoners and condemned as heretic Catholics.

Dr. Ephraim Bueno, by Jan Lievens

The government of the republic, the Council of State, repeatedly lent support to the Portuguese Jews. In 1657, a vessel with 27 Jewish emigrants en route to Barbados with a precious cargo was seized by an Irish ship on assignment by the Spanish government. On July 17, 1657, the Council of State passed a resolution, which determined that Jewish residents of the republic residing abroad were to be considered subjects of the republic and were to be treated accordingly. This resolution was intended to protect Jews abroad because in the various provinces and cities Jews were subject to all kinds of restrictions. Thus, Jews were no longer viewed as strangers by the people of the Netherlands. They were part of the Dutch population although with fewer rights than the Christians. It is noteworthy that the Catholics also suffered from restrictive regulations. By their wealth, energy, their cultural and political level, the Sephardi Jews achieved in the middle of the 17th century a high degree of civil status, and a measure of religious freedom, which their co-religionists in many other countries would not attain for another hundred years or more.

Jews become enfranchised

By JOSEPH MICHMAN

Part II

The word that Jews could finally become enfranchised citizens of their country came from Paris in 1789. The idea, though, that Jews should participate in contemporary culture had been advanced prior to this by Moses Mendelssohn in Berlin.

What was the situation for the Jews in the country north of Paris and west of Berlin, the Republic of the United Netherlands?

Jewish history in the republic had been an interesting one, mainly because of the notable Spanish-Portuguese community of Amsterdam. However, by the end of the 18th century this Sephardi community was no longer as wealthy or as influential as it had been in its heyday during the Dutch Golden Age, even though Portuguese Jews continued to be held in higher esteem than their Ashkenazi (or High-German) co-religionists.

By now, the number of Ashkenazi Jews far exceeded that of Sephardi Jews, both in the republic as a whole and in Amsterdam. Around this time the republic had over 40,000 Jewish residents — more or less the same number as in France. What made the situation different from that of all other European countries was the fact that more than half of these Jews lived in one city. Amsterdam had 20,000 Askenazi and 2,800 Sephardi inhabitants – the largest concentration of Jews in a single city anywhere in Europe. By comparison: in 1797, Warsaw had 7,700 Jewish inhabitants; Krakow (in 1824) 9,690; Berlin (in 1812) 3,293; and Paris (in 1798) no more than 500. The Jews comprised about 12 percent of the population of Amsterdam, constituting a distinct ethnic minority: a "Jewish Nation." Ashkenazi Jews had their own vernacular, Amsterdam Yiddish, an offshoot of Western-European Yiddish.

The Jews in general were a visible feature in the city scene, particularly because of their centrally located synagogues, towering edifices which, together with their adjoining administration buildings, created the impression of a form of Jewish government centre. At the same time, not a single visitor of the Jewish quarter could fail to notice the dire poverty. Over 80 percent of the Jews were dependent upon the community's kupat zedakah, the charity fund. Thousands of Jews were barely able to feed themselves and many did not have a roof over their heads. When speaking about the Jews of Amsterdam, one did not think of individuals, but of an amorphous grey mass governed by an autonomous Jewish administration composed of the powerful and wealthy parnassim.

A young neighbour of Rembrandt

The political significance of this sociological phenomenon can best be illustrated by the events that took place eight years before the occupation of the country in 1795 by the French army. An opposition party called the Patriots had been formed in the republic. The Patriots demanded constitutional changes, greater democracy, greater influence of the people on the government, and increased accountability of the authorities for their financial management. Despite the fact that the party was led by influential personalities, its following in Amsterdam consisted mainly of craftsmen and petty traders who regarded the Jews as dangerous competitors. The situation was aggrevated by the fact that, almost to a man, the Jews venerated the Stadtholders, the princes of the House of Orange, who, without exception, had been traditionally sympathetic to the Jews. The last Stadtholder, Prince William V, even employed a Jewish banker, Benjamin Cohen, with whom he was on excellent personal terms.

The Patriots, on the other hand,

The Potato Menorah

Many years ago, a very simple, inexpensive way to celebrate the candle lighting was to cut thick slices of potatoes, put a small opening in the centre and place the Chanukah candles. Naturally, one piece of potato would be higher than the rest to act as a Shamus. The potato, because it is moist, also extinguishes the candle as it burns down, acting as a safety device.

Poème de Hanouccah

Il y a longtemps au passé,
Antiochus le roi était très fâché.
Il n'aimait pas les Juifs
Il pensait que nous faisions des malices.
Il voulait tous nous tuer,
Les grands, les petits et puis les bébés.
Les Maccabées ne voulaient pas cela,
Alors ils ont battu Antiochus et ses soldats.
C'était là le premier miracle,
Et c'était vraiment tout un spectacle.
Les Juifs sont revenus le soir,
Le Bet Hamikdash ils ne voulaient pas voir.
Les Romains ont tout détruit,
Les Juifs pensaient que tout était fini.
Mais les Juifs sont restés fiers,
Voilà pourquoi HaShem nous a donné la lumière.

On l'appelle la fête des Maccabées
parce que Yehoudah et ses frères ont chassé d'Israël les Syriens et les malins.

On l'appelle aussi
la fête des lumières
parce que les Cohen et les Levi ont joui de l'huile bénie pour allumer leur ménorah chérie.

Maintenant on joue avec les toupies et on se rappelle
notre histoire fleurie.

Finalement on remercie
Elokim pour avoir créé
ce miracle de l'huile et pour les toupies.

Chanukah, Hip, Hip, Hooray!

Chanukah, Hip, Hip, Hooray!
Chanukah, the best Holiday!
I like to see all the candles when they give light,
They are prettier than three stars in the night.

Elizabeth Waitzer, 5 years old

Hurray, It's Chanukah

What's that I see?
Chanukah!
the menorah shines its light making the house
all cozy and bright.

I want to sing and play
but so long ago on this very day...
There was a nation strong and mean and large, large animals could be seen.

They wanted Jews to bow to stone but only one God for Jews was known.
The Maccabees fought back so brave making all their people rave.

Although their army wasn't strong, they believed in God so much; so long
The Greeks destroyed their holy place,
Putting sad looks on every Jew's face.

The menorah was found but no oil turned up until somebody saw it,
but it wasn't enough.

The Jews feared it wouldn't last one day
but they lit the menorah anyway.
It shone one day and then eight so the Jews began to celebrate!

And up to this very day
we remember the miracle and we say:
"nes gadol hayah sham."

It's Chanukah
Hurray, hurray!!!

Jodie Shupac, 10 years old

Every Candle Tells a Story

Every candle tells a story of what they remember.
Some tell of the Maccabees' courage and might,
and some of what we remember on this night.
Some tell of a bad man who wouldn't even
Let the Jews speak their language or pray!
Some tell of happy children spinning a dreidel at play.
With some of the candles I can even hear the cry of babies, and with some I can even taste
the latkes that are yummy, and the jelly doughnuts that fill our tummy.
There is one thing very special about these candles...

Thank you for all your entries these candles don't burn out.

Chanukah

Nine candles burning,
The big leader, leading.
Watch as they burn,
Watch as we learn.

We're all happy and glowing,
Enjoying the Chanukah feeling,
We're watching the candles melting,
As the dreidel is spinning.

A kiss goodnight,
And knowing the candles
Will protect us,
All through the night.

Laura Menache, 11 years old

A Special Chanukah

A special Chanukah it will be,
Because someone special will be celebrating with me.
She was not here last year at all.
Until this summer when I got a call.
My best friend she came to be,
And I always will think of her as a CHANUKAH BABY.
It is not that she was born on this holiday,
It is just that she came the same way.
A miracle is what I mean,
And that is the way she will always be seen,
My best friend she came to be,
And I will always think of her as a CHANUKAH BABY.
I never thought that I would see
A beautiful baby sister that we called Marni.
To see her today,
Smiling away,
It is hard to believe that there was ever a day,
That I thought maybe,
There would not be a baby.

Cara Gladstone, 9 years old

Oh! How I Love Chanukah

People spinning and fussing
Around the menorah
All those nice candles
Burning away
Shrinking all the way
People happy and joyful
Little children spinning dreidels
Eating cholcolate gelt and smiling away
Their brown painted faces lighting up the day.

People standing around the menorah
Singing happy Chanukah songs

Candle flames
Comforting everyone
Bringing them together
In peace and harmony

Families enjoying their Chanukah feast
Eating latkes and doughnuts
Tasting even better on these special nights

Against the windows
For all to see
Our lit menorahs
Standing in pride for our past victory

Hurray for Chanukah!
Our message of love, peace and liberty!

Oh! How I love Chanukah!

Laura Cohen, 9 years old

The War

'Twas the Maccabees that won the war
Without them the Jews would be no more
More than one died for the Lord
As they faced the enemy's sword.

One by one the menorahs are lit
Right next to it we do sit
And the legend goes on and on
As we remember the moment the candles shone.

David Schecter, 9 years old

Nerot, Nerot

Nerot, nerot, you shine so bright to gaily light up our Chanukah night.

Nerot, nerot, do not burn too fast; we want our Chanukah night to last.

Nerot, nerot, you stand so tall; just like the Maccabees, one and all.

Nerot, Nerot, we see your light and hope for peace this Chanukah night.

Skirmishes in Amsterdam

were fierce opponents of William V, whom they regarded as the embodiment of the corrupt ancien régime. In 1787, the Patriots rose in revolt and William V was deposed. His brother-in-law, the Prussian king, dispatched an army to the republic to suppress the insurrection.

Meanwhile, an extremely tense situation prevailed in the country. In Amsterdam, during the brief period of Patriot rule, there were many skirmishes, with the Jewish masses throwing their weight behind the Prince of Orange. There were several fatalities on both sides, and for a short time it looked as though a full-blown civil war was inevitable. The parnassim of both the High-German and the Portuguese community posted armed guards to protect their synagogues. Soon however, the Patriot city fathers concluded an arrangement with the parnassim preventing Jews from entering Patriot districts and Patriot followers from entering the Jewish quarter. Thus, the Jewish alliance with the House of Orange was neutralized, but in exchange, the Jews received a measure of territorial autonomy that they had never previously enjoyed. Peace appeared to be restored, although the mutual enmity had by no means disappeared.

By and large, therefore, the situation did not look very promising for the Jewish population when the Patriots came to power. Liberty, equality and fraternity was an exalted slogan, but the Patriots had no intention of allowing the Jews to share in the changes. In August 1795, there were several pogrom-like attacks on the Jewish quarter — the only ones ever to take place in the history of The Netherlands — and several Patriot journals published vituperative articles against the idea of granting civil rights to the "Jewish Nation."

A small number of progressive Jews united in a Jewish patriotic club named Felix Libertate, which, however, was not admitted to the confederation of Patriotic clubs. In both their writings and their speeches, these Jews attempted to convince fellow Jews and their party associates that the time had come to put an end to old, exclusive loyalties.

In March 1795, six members of Felix Libertate addressed a petition to the National Assembly of the republic requesting the enfranchisement of the Jews. The petition provoked a lengthy discussion in the assembly, which was noted for its high level of debate and absence of anti-Semitic expressions.

The fact that the assemblymen included quite a few ministers of the Church and several theologians explains the frequent recourse to theological arguments by the opponents of emancipation. According to their arguments, the Jews regarded themselves as a separate nation which would march up to Zion when the Messiah came.

Equal rights debated at last

Therefore, they could hardly be considered part of the population of the Netherlands.

The advocates of equal rights countered that if the Jews were given the opportunity to live as citizens with equal rights, they would surely choose to remain in The Netherlands even after the Messiah had arrived, as most Jews had chosen to stay in Babylonia after Cyrus had permitted their return to the Land of Israel.

Intensive lobbying took place outside the assembly hall, with two Amsterdam advocates opposing enfranchisement and the enlightened Jews pleading for the adoption of equal rights. The French envoy, a prestigious figure in the National Assembly circles composed exclusively of Patriot representives, brought heavy pressure to bear on the delegates to follow the French example and accord the Jews civil rights.

The Jews were granted full franchise. The principle that had decided the issue in France also turned the scales in The Netherlands. As the Comte de Clermond-Ferrand had declared in France: "Jews as individuals deserve everything, Jews as a Nation deserve nothing." In this spirit the Emancipation Decree was adopted by a unanimous vote on Sept. 2, 1796.

On paper, therefore, the Jews were now citizens with equal rights, and municipal governments no longer had any business with Jewish community affairs. However, the reality was rather different, as correctly foreseen by a French journalist who had attended the debates. He wrote that although the members of the National Assembly had accepted the Emancipation Decree, its implementation would be a long time in coming. In most cities and towns, the situation remained essentially as it had been before. Ten years after the adoption of the decree, six Jewish proponents of emancipation complained that the situation of the Jews in Amsterdam had worsened rather than improved, from both a political and an economic point of view. Not a single Jew had been elected to any official function or public office, and neither had Jewish craftsmen been admitted to the guilds. During the ancien régime, the Burgomasters had often turned a blind eye to infractions of anti-Jewish regulations, but after 1795, the authorities did nothing to give the Jews access to occupations which had been closed to them before the revolution.

A Jew from the city

Who knows how long this situation would have continued? But for the efforts of Louis Napoleon, who was appointed king of the newly created Kingdom of the Netherlands (1806-1810), the enfranchisement of the Jews might have remained hollow.

Louis Napoleon displayed unusual goodwill towards his new kingdom, and, it would seem, even more towards his Jewish subjects. Louis Napoleon appointed Jews to high offices: his personal physician was Dr. Emanuel Capadoce, and Dr. Jonas Daniel Meyer became the director of the Official Gazette of his realm. He also asked the High-German Jewish community of Amsterdam to propose names of Jewish notables as candidates for additional public offices.The public markets in the kingdom were moved from Saturday to a weekday, in order to enable Jewish traders to compete, and a letter was isssued forbidding provincial governments to apply discriminatory measures against Jews. He even wrote a personal letter to the Jewish community emphasizing that he would refrain from doing anything that would offend Jewish religious sensibilities. Even the abject poverty of the Jews of Amsterdam, which was totally ignored by his Dutch advisers, attracted his compassion.

In order to put an end to the organizational chaos of Jewish communal life, which in his opinion, was one of the main impediments to the amelioration of the Jews' social conditions, Louis Napoleon installed a central governing body, called the High Consistory, to which all the previously independent Jewish communities were made subject. He also appointed leaders who were representatives of the small majority of Jewish proponents for a speedier integration of the Jews into Dutch society.

In the end, Louis Napoleon's good intentions failed because of the imperialistic policies of his brother, Napoleon Bonaparte, who regarded The Netherlands as an outlying French province, important only for its potential yield in money and soldiers. When in 1810 the kingdom was abolished and annexed to France, it was in worse economic condition than when Louis Napoleon had received it, and this was especially true for the Jews.

During the period of annexation, the hatred felt by the Dutch for their French occupiers became increasingly virulent, even in the Jewish quarter of Amsterdam. By the time the French Empire disintegrated, this anger had reached such a peak that riots erupted even inside the Great Synagogue of Amsterdam. A strong current among the Jews wanted to annul all the new French decrees, including the Emancipation Decree itself, and thereby return to the situation of before 1795.

The parnassim of the High Consistory, who as in France, were now called Commissaires-surveillants, were physically assaulted and barely escaped being dumped into the canal. As well, within the Municipal Council, following the example of most of the German states in 1813, voices were heard demanding the abolition of Jewish emancipation.

But these demands were rejected. The new king, William III of Orange, was an enlightened monarch, whose advisors believed that the institutions of Louis Napoleon should be maintained to promote the integration of the Jews. The Jewish franchise was left untouched.

Even so, contrary to the trend under Louis Napoleon, no practical measures were taken to enable the Jews to enjoy the fruits of this equality. The Jews of The Netherlands were left to pursue their daily lives as they saw fit, but any anti-Semitism was of a non-violent character.

Nevertheless, only after many decades passed, would Jews be appointed to university positions or be allowed to sit on municipal councils. Until 1940, there was not a single Jewish burgomaster, and not a single Jew served as a Dutch ambassador. In government circles, a certain reserve continued regarding Jewish incumbents, even though this was never publicly voiced. Only after the Holocaust would the last vestiges of discrimination among Dutch officialdom disappear.

Belmonte: the rebirth of an old Jewish community

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter

BELMONTE, PORTUGAL — Clara Mouyal Cohen's family thought she was crazy when she announced her intention to marry Joaquim Manuel Vaz Morão, a Portuguese Marrano the Moroccan-born woman had met in Spain.

"Are they really Jewish?" her mother asked skeptically. Belmonte's clannish Marrano community, while outwardly Catholic — attending church at the very least for baptisms, weddings and funerals — had maintained Jewish customs in secret for almost five centuries following the expulsion of the Jews from Portugal.

Today, more than a decade after the Morãos' marriage, the distinctions between Marranos and those who practise Judaism openly have begun to blur — at least in this mountain town's unique Jewish community of approximately 100 families out of a total population of 3,500.

This week, as Jews around the world recall the miracle of the Temple oil that lasted eight days, Jews in Belmonte, some 325 kilometres northeast of Lisbon, have an added reason to celebrate. On Wednesday (Dec. 4), a new synagogue, complete with a reception hall and basement mikvah, is being dedicated.

Other events scheduled in Portugal to commemorate the 500th anniversary of the expulsion of the Jews this week include a special parliamentary session, the dedication of a monument in Lisbon and ceremonies being held at both the Dona Maria II National Theatre and the Shaare Tikve Synagogue in Lisbon.

"There's no question that there was a miracle here in Belmonte. The Jews here have kept their religion secretly for over 500 years without spiritual leaders, without access to the Torah or any of the Jewish books of laws," said Rabbi Joseph Sebag in Expulsion & Memory: The Descendents of the Hidden Jews, Simcha Jacobovici's recent film.

From King Solomon's time

The rabbi, a descendent of Jews who were expelled from Spain, had been sent from Israel to Belmonte at the community's request. His description of their extraordinary survival is hardly an exaggeration.

According to legend, Jews came to the Iberian Peninsula at the time of King Solomon (10th century BCE).

From the time Portugal became an independent country in the 12th century, life was good for local Jews. Most knew how to read and write, and many were trained in mathematics or medicine, skills that were useful to the monarchs.

At its height, the community was spread out among over 130 judiarias (Jewish quarters) in various towns.

In the 1300s, however, tension began to arise between Jews and the greater Christian population. During the reign of King John I (1385-1432), Jews were forced to wear distinctive habits and had to abide by a nighttime curfew. In 1449, there was a riot against the Jews of Lisbon.

The Jewish population swelled in the 1400s, as Spanish Jews found temporary respite from ongoing persecution in neighboring Portugal. At one point there was a Jewish refugee camp of 5,000 people in the Portuguese town of Marvao, six km from the Spanish border.

Only four years after the 1492 expulsion of the Spanish Jews, Portugal's King Manuel I signed an expulsion edict on Dec. 4, 1496, to fulfil a condition of his marriage to the Spanish princess Isabella.

Within the year, he had instituted forced conversions, in an attempt to keep the Jews, with their valuable education and skills, in the country. Under a 20-year ban on persecution for religious indiscretions, a significant number of so-called New Christians adapted Judaism to their new lives. They began to pass on Jewish traditions from one generation to the next, even through the Portuguese Inquisition, which lasted from 1536 to 1821 and during which 1,200 Jews were burned at the stake.

A goodly number of medieval doorposts bear indentations which likely mark the spots once adorned by mezuzahs. Ironically, another common form of evidence that medieval Jewish communities existed in Portugal can be found in the Christian crosses which identified homes where the inhabitants had outwardly embraced Christianity, said Carmen Balesteros, a 35-year-old non-Jewish archeologist who teaches at the University of Evora.

In Belmonte, interestingly, researchers found inverted Christian crosses. "What can this mean?" asked Balesteros. One possibility, she suggested, was a sly indication of the community's anger and need to express their true religion.

Street names, both current and medieval, also provide clues to a medieval Jewish presence. Jewish quarters commonly have streets called Rua Nova (New Street) in reference to New Christians, said Balesteros.

While the medieval name meaning Street of the Midrash is obviously Jewish, the 15th-century name of another Portuguese street has a subtle but probable echo of anti-Semitism. Rua da Tinhoso refers to a contagious disease suffered by dogs as well as humans. A common derogatory term for Jews at the time was "dogs," explained Balesteros.

Although the Spanish term Marrano is still considered pejorative by some (it means "pig"), the crypto-Jews we met insisted it was no longer an insult. In fact, it's the word they use to refer to themselves.

Although it's no longer necessary for them to hide Friday night candles nor to bake matzah a day earlier or later than "open Jews," some Marranos continue to do so "because they want to keep the tradition of their grandparents and great-grandparents," said Clara Morão through an interpreter.

Her husband Joaquim, vice-president of Belmonte's Jewish community, underwent a formal conversion to Judaism 10 years ago under the auspices of the late Rabbi Abraham Assor of Lisbon. "He always thought he would like to marry a Jew," said Clara. "He wanted to live as a real Jew."

Unlike Joaquim Morão, most of the Belmonte Marranos married within their own sub-community, sometimes within their own extended family. As a result of inbreeding, some of them now suffer from congenital night blindness.

Whom to marry isn't currently an issue in the Belmonte community; those closest to marriageable age are only in their mid-teens.

Joaquim's mother is still Marrano, but "even if they don't go to synagogue, it's the same community," said Clara, who welcomed our group into her small, typically Jewish home adorned with mezuzot, Jewish needlepoint and Jewish ceremonial objects. "Marranos [here] don't go to church

Jewish presence is sunny and remarkable any more. If a Marrano Jew dies, they go to the synagogue and ask the rabbi to make a service."

The Belmonte community has been recognized by Israel and recently welcomed its third rabbi, sent for a minimum six-month stint by the Jewish Agency in cooperation with Jerusalem's Midrash Sephardi yeshivah. Rabbi Shlomo Haber (pronounced chaver, as in the Hebrew word for friend) is a 22-year-old Brazilian who is also trained as a shochet.

For the past half-dozen years or so, the Belmonte Jewish community has worshipped in a tiny apartment, the women in a separate room behind the men. A small window in the dividing wall enables them to hear and perhaps see the service.

The community is indebted to its Paris-based Moroccan benefactor, Shlomo Azoulay, who funded the building of the new synagogue. There are about 150 seats in its sanctuary — men downstairs, women in the balcony. "[Azoulay] was sent by God," said Clara.

The community can use more benefactors, she noted. Although many of the local Jews work as merchants or in their own businesses, it's a poor community, she said, adding that they could use children's toys and books.

Jewish children learn to read Hebrew and sing Hebrew songs during Sunday classes taught by the rabbi. During the week they attend school with local Catholic children.

One of the local schoolteachers, Helena da Costa, grew up Marrano in Lisbon and is now a committed open Jew. She and her husband Carlos, a physician who is also of Marrano extraction, decided to convert formally to Judaism a few years after their 1973 marriage.

Da Costa's efforts resulted in the placement last year of a large chanukiah of her own design on permanent public display in Belmonte.

The da Costas' spacious tile-roofed home in nearby Covilha contains a number of chanukiot, including a black iron one that she welded herself. An artist who teaches Grade 7 and 9 art and design, da Costa recently illustrated the cover of a book called The Rescue of the Portuguese Marranos and designed upbeat "Mazaltov" notecards to mark this week's events.

The Jewish presence in her home is sunny and unmistakable. Even the family pets are part of it. Of the da Costas' four cats, three are named Golda Meir, Oskar Schindler and Isaac Bashevis Singer. (The fourth is White Socks.)

In the classroom, da Costa has noted a harmonious relationship between Jews and Christians. An exception occurred when she found a swastika on her blackboard in an isolated incident that she used as an opportunity to educate her students.

A representative of the Belmonte mayor's office, which funded the public chanukiah, told a group of visiting Jewish journalists that there are "positive changes" now that the Marrano community has gone public. "Everyone knew they had strange customs, but now it's better because they're not so strange any more."

In 1979, when the da Costas moved to Covilhã, they sought out co-religionists in Belmonte.

As guests in a Marrano home for Friday night dinner, their only clue to their host's beliefs were his sister's repeated comments about having to get dressed, da Costa recalls. Finally the sister was told, "They are like us. You can speak."

Even now, Marranos are circumspect about their practices. Sara Molho, an Israeli sociologist researching a book on the Belmonte community, said it took her two years to gain the confidence of local Marranos before they would invite her into their homes.

The da Costas, who still live in Covilhã, are not typical of the Belmonte community, but it's evident they are warmly accepted. In the course of a brief stroll in town, Helena was greeted affectionately by a young Jewish student and an elderly Marrano woman, among others.

The da Costas are the only members of their families to have converted. When Helena first told her parents that her future husband was Jewish, her father told her, "Don't say that.

"Yes, they gave us a hard time," she said, "but I think they love that the girls [the da Costas' two daughters, ages 17 and 20] are studying [Judaism]."

Frances Kraft was in Portugal this fall as a guest of the Portuguese National Tourist Office and TAP Air Portugal.

Sabbath violators raided

Government targets Tel Aviv businesses

By NAOMI SEGAL
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — The battle over whether so-called "blue laws" should be enforced, keeping businesses closed during the Sabbath, has taken a new turn.

Last Saturday, inspectors from the Labor and Social Affairs Ministry raided snack bars and newsstands in the Tel Aviv area that were open on the Sabbath.

In an effort to prevent the ministry itself from violating the Sabbath, the inspectors carrying out the checks were Druze Arabs, not Jews.

Labor and Social Affairs Minister Eliyahu Yishai said the inspections were part of an effort to ensure fair competition.

"There are many business owners in Tel Aviv who do not want to work on the Sabbath and they complain that because their competitors are open on the Sabbath, they have no other choice," he told the Israeli daily Ma'ariv.

"The auditors are doing their work throughout the country and will continue enforcing the law," said Yishai, who is a member of the religious Shas party.

Last week, after an Orthodox-sponsored rally was held in Tel Aviv to prevent local businesses from desecrating the Sabbath, there were reports that the ministry was tripling the number of inspectors.

That rally was organized by the Agudat Yisrael party to demand the closure of Tel Aviv's numerous movie theaters, bars, cafes and other places of entertainment from sundown Friday until the end of the Sabbath. Organizers said that if the Sabbath is not observed in Tel Aviv, its observance could be further eroded in other communities.

The head of the labor law branch at the ministry, Ephraim Kechalon, denied that the inspections were related to the rally.

"The weekend raids had nothing to do with it," he told Ma'ariv. "This was an audit which was planned months ago."

During their rounds, inspectors slapped citations on the baffled owners of two snack bars in Ramat Gan, a municipality adjacent to Tel Aviv.

"We have been open [on the Sabbath] for the past eight years, and we were surprised to suddenly have auditors asking us for information," said Meir Ofer, an employee at one of the businesses.

Ramat Gan Mayor Zvi Bar said businesses that were open on the Sabbath did so with the consent of the municipal council, as part of the religious status quo.

The auditors also warned shopowners in northern Tel Aviv that the area would be a central target in coming weeks.

Until now, the battle between Haredim and secular groups over synagogue-state issues has focused on Jerusalem.

Cyclist pedals special cause in Israel

By LEORA EREN FRUCHT
CJN Israel Correspondent

TEL AVIV — A Canadian cyclist who has pedalled 55,000 kilometres in three years arrived in Israel last week to keep a promise to Jewish friends dying of AIDS.

Bertrand Boudreau altered the route of his AIDS fundraising tour in order to be in Israel on Dec. 1 – International AIDS Day.

"I wanted to do something special in Israel because of a promise I made to Jewish friends in Florida," explained Boudreau, who has criss-crossed North America, Central America, Europe and west Africa on his bicycle.

He was scheduled to arrive in Turkey this week, but changed his plans in order to come to Israel first.

"My Jewish friends told me that we might never see each other again and urged me to visit Israel. Since then, some of them have died of AIDS. Others are alive and waiting to hear that I made it to Israel. They wanted me to bring my message here."

Feature

Boudreau, who is not HIV-positive, has been trying to increase awareness about the risk of AIDS and encourage people to have compassion for its victims. He embarked on his world cycling trip in August 1993 with $40 in his pocket and no sponsors. He pays for his travel expenses and raises funds for AIDS organizations by soliciting companies in the cities he visits.

SuperPharm sponsored the Middle Eastern leg of his trip, which will include stops in Egypt, Jordan, Syria, Turkey and Iran.

Until a chance encounter in a Victoria cafe with a woman whose brother died of AIDS, Boudreau had never known anyone with the disease. That meeting prompted him to volunteer at a the Victoria Persons With AIDS Society.

He says the idea of cycling around the world came to him in a dream.

The News in Brief

CANADA

Sponsoring Immigrants

MONTREAL — The Jewish community signed its third agreement with the Quebec government promising to sponsor up to 100 families from the former Soviet Union, in exchange for their receiving special attention by the province's immigration office in Vienna.

The families are expected to begin arriving in Montreal as landed immigrants in 12 to 18 months.

'Frum' Health

MONTREAL — Like a number of other cities in the world where there are large "frum" communities, Montreal's ultra-Orthodox Jews will soon have their own emergency medical response service.

Hatzoloh, as the service is known, is not intended to replace, but rather to supplement, the public Urgences Santé, assisting it in overcoming language or "cultural barriers," said local coordinator Zev Neuwirth.

ISRAEL

Beilin Enters Labor Race

JERUSALEM – The race for chair of the Labor party widened last week, after Knesset member Yossi Beilin announced his candidacy for the party's leadership.

The party is set to elect in early June a new leader who would run for the premiership in the next general election, expected in the year 2000.

Attack On Reform

JERUSALEM — A leader of the haredi Agudat Yisrael party last week stated that the secularized stance of Reform Jewry led to the Holocaust.

Pinchas Horowitz, the party's deputy chair, made the controversial remark during a Tel Aviv news conference.

Attorney General Resigning

JERUSALEM – Israel's attorney general has announced that he plans to step down effective Jan. 1.

When submitting his letter of resignation to Justice Minister Tzachi Hanegbi, Michael Ben-Yair gave no reason for his decision. Ben-Yair was appointed three years ago by Yitzhak Rabin.

JNF Seeks New President

NEW YORK – It may be too soon to call, but Ronald Lauder – cosmetics heir, philanthropist and former U.S. ambassador to Austria – apparently is being eyed as the next president of the Jewish National Fund of America.

BA Apologizes

NEW YORK – British Airways has issued an apology for ejecting an Orthodox Jew from an airline lounge at London's Heathrow Airport.

Aaron Tyk, an assistant attorney general for New York State, went to the lounge last month to recite his morning prayers during a layover while he was travelling from Tel Aviv to New York. Tyk said an airline employee asked him to leave because the lounge was "only for Muslims."

Cemetery Desecration

MOSCOW – For the first time, Russian federal officials are launching an investigation into the desecration of a Jewish cemetery.

The office of Russia's prosecutor general initiated a criminal investigation after 16 graves were recently destroyed in the Jewish cemetery of Saratov, located some 450 miles southeast of Moscow.

Rabbi Knighted

NEW YORK – Rabbi M. Mitchell Serels, director of the Sephardic Community Programs at Yeshiva University, has become the first rabbi to be knighted by Spain's King Juan Carlos I.

Rabbi Serels received the Order of Civil Merit which recognizes "outstanding services or efforts in work of a civil nature" for helping bring about better relations between Spain and Sephardi Jews.

DISCONTENT BLAMED ON SOVIET AGENTS

Some immigration officials and the leadership of Georgian Jews in Israel are blaming provocateurs for much of the alleged unrest among Georgians in Israel, which has been the headline news in the Israeli press. However, independent observers suggest there are other reasons: the special nature of Georgian immigration and the failure to take account of this in arranging their settlement.

Most of the Georgians are very Orthodox, yet do not have trades, crafts or professions, and are used to close community ties. On their arrival in Israel, they were sent to development areas, often with no regard to their close-linked community life and need for religious surroundings.

HEBREW APPROVED FOR CREDIT

Hebrew will be the first "ethnic language" to count for credit in Ontario's schools. The department of education has approved courses taught at Beth Jacob High School for Girls and Ner Israel Yeshiva College. Beth Jacob will grant one credit in Hebrew in Grade 12 and two credits towards Grade 13.

Responsibility.

As an integral part of Toronto's Jewish community, we do more than offer a service - we accept the responsibility of fulfilling some of the most meaningful religious and social traditions of our community.

This has been a tradition in our family for four generations.

New AJC president outlines his agenda

By JOEL JACOBSON
CJN Atlantic Correspondent

HALIFAX — Victor Goldberg has given himself two specific goals and several others as he begins a two-year term as president of the Atlantic Jewish Council (AJC).

For more on the AJC conference see pages 22, 23

The Halifax lawyer, assuming responsibility at the biennial general meeting of the four-province organization Dec. 1, said the council must provide chaplain service to those small communities without rabbis in the Atlantic region.

The only communities with full-time rabbis are Halifax and Fredericton. Rabbi David Ellis left Moncton's congregation last summer and has not been replaced. Congregations in Saint John, St. John's and Sydney have been without full-time rabbinic service for several years.

Goldberg also is spearheading a senior citizen's residence initiative, either independent living or a home for special care, with Halifax seniors' residence Northwood Centre.

"There are many Haligonians now living at Northwood Manor in both the independent and care-programs. We feel we can service many more seniors from the entire region at the Halifax complex and can use Northwood's manpower and physical resources for this unique opportunity. We're working on a co-venture with Northwood and already have a co-chair in place with another person soon to be named."

Goldberg said he is prepared to work with JIAS to bring immigrant families to the region. "The long-term life of small communities will come by adding to the population. We have an initiative in its early stages."

He also emphasized that the AJC will continue to ensure no needy Jewish person in the region is deprived of participating in programming, "here or abroad, because of financial inability."

Goldberg replaced Larry Freeman, Halifax, who served four years as president.

In remarks concluding his presidency, Freeman said he had two goals as he started his second term in 1994. "We wanted to have a youth coordinator and, Yakov Feig, on staff for almost two years, has done a marvelous job with our youth and teens. It was a pilot project with Canadian Jewish Federation and United Israel Appeal and is now being adopted in other regions. We started a seniors activity program which has been well-attended, and continued to publish [regional quarterly magazine] Shalom, keeping costs in line."

Other executive members of the AJC are: first vice-president, Sheva Medjuck, Halifax; second vice-president, Mark Rosen, Halifax; secretrary, Barbara Paton, Halifax; treasurer, Michael Pink, Halifax; members at large: Irwin Lampert, Moncton; Ivan Levine, Fredericton; Sherry Pink, Seymour Prince, Zack Rubin, Kathy Zilbert, all of Halifax; legal counsel, Mark David, Halifax; regional CRC chair, Tom Kuttner, Fredericton.

Community representatives will be appointed from within Saint John, Fredericton, Moncton, Cape Breton, Newfoundland, Prince Edward Island and Nova Scotia's Annapolis Valley.

Moncton judge Irwin Lampert was awarded the Bernard M. Bloomfield Award by Jewish National Fund for meritorious service at the conference.

Lampert has been chair of JNF Atlantic for 10 years and on the national executive for the same period. Mark Mendelson, executive director, JNF Eastern region, called Lampert a "devoted JNF worker, willing to open doors for us and introduce us to people who can make a difference."

KING DAVID

The Neighbours, a Tel Aviv group of young people aged 16-18, will be performing the Biblical Rock Opera King David at the New City Playhouse in Vaughan, Dec. 14 at 8 p.m. They have also appeared in Montreal, Vancouver and Calgary. See Eye on Arts item on page 40.

Filmmaker asks hard questions

Last week, I received an article by Ilan Maget that appeared in the Shabbat supplement to the Dec. 12 issue of the Israeli daily Ha'aretz about philosopher, writer and filmmaker Simcha Jacobovici.

Jacobovici will be familiar to readers of The CJN and indeed, to millions of North Americans. In September, he and Elliot Halpern won an Emmy award for "outstanding investigative journalism" for their 1994 documentary about the Ebola virus called The Plague Monkeys. The film also won a Cable Ace Award in 1995 and a Gemini Award in 1996. (See The CJN Sept. 19.)

Plague Monkeys is part of an impressive corpus of documentary films whose chief hallmarks are originality of theme, social relevance, unembellished photo-journalism and hard-hitting exposition. That body of work includes: Falasha, Deadly Currents, The Selling of Innocents and Expulsion and Memory.

Maget interviewed Jacobovici at his home in Toronto. The Emmy award was the springboard for the interview. From there it soared into a biographical sketch and a wide-ranging exploration of the ideas and purposes that motivate Jacobovici.

Jacobovici was born in Israel in 1953. His parents were survivors. When he was nine years old his family moved to Canada. He describes himself as the type of person who does not keel over in the face of authority, which he attributes to the influence of his parents and of his Israeli upbringing.

From his early days as a young student leader of Network, he was a firebrand, never afraid to ask the hard, impolitic question.

Among Jacobovici's current projects are a film based on the Neil Gabler book, How the Jews Invented Hollywood, and a film on the 10 lost tribes.

His insights, as recorded by Maget, are interesting and even inspiring. I record some of them to let the readers judge for themselves.

(All translations from the Hebrew text are by The CJN.)

On the classic Hollywood western: "Just think for a minute about the plot of a typical western. A group of decent, law-abiding, unprotected, somewhat timid citizens live in a small town. Outside the town is a group of hooligans. They ride on horses, wear tall leather boots. From time to time, these hooligans ride into town, pillaging, plundering, raping and murdering.

"What is really being described here is a group of marauding Cossacks. The western was not born in Wyoming or in Utah. It was taken directly from the shtetl."

On the search for the 10 lost tribes: "Of course, I am not the first person to search for the tribes. Columbus, for example, did so too.

"Some people think that he was in search of India. But I think that he was searching for the 10 tribes. We know for a fact that the translator with him was Jewish. Why would he have needed a Jewish translator? In order to speak in Hebrew with the 10 lost tribes.

"It may sound somewhat like Mel Brooks, but I am convinced that when Columbus and the translator left the ship, the first words that were spoken on the shores of the new world were Shalom Aleichem."

To introduce Jacobovici's thoughts on the influence of his Judaism on his work, Maget informs the readers that Jacobovici prays three times a day, observes the Shabbat and the laws of kashrut. But he does not wear a kippah.

On the Judaism within his work: "If someone is considered a good filmmaker, people usually say it is in spite of the fact that he is a believing Jew. In my case, it is because of the fact that I am a believing Jew.

"The three outstanding foundations of my life are my 'Israeliness,' my Judaism and the fact that I am the son of survivors.

"They are the driving forces behind the subjects of my work – oppressed and suffering groups – and the guiding hand that leads me in the manner of my work.

"It is simply the idea of tikun olam, that is, a little bit of tikun olam. After all, we are not angels."

Investigator calls attention to Nazi war crimes

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Prior to setting out on his crusade to bring attention to Nazi war criminals living in Canada, Steve Rambam was invited to meet with a Nazi-hunter in Jerusalem. The man had heard about his intention to interview aging Nazis and he had a word of warning for the New York private investigator.

Be careful, he said. These old men talk to each other.

With that in mind, Rambam set out on a two-year venture during which he interviewed 62 alleged Nazi war criminals, while secretly taping their conversations. Forgoing appointments made in advance, Rambam decided it was better tactically to show up at their homes unannounced, presenting himself as an academic studying policing during the war. He would attempt to get them to describe their wartime experiences, while secretly recording their conversation.

On one occasion, one of his subjects was "confessing" to his membership in the Latvian Arajs Kommando, which collaborated with the Nazis in the murder of more than 20,000 Jews, when the man's wife left the room to make a phone call. A short time later, a large fellow drove up to the house, hurried in with his hand in his coat pocket, demanding to know what Rambam was doing.

"I asked him his name" — a good way to calm him down, Rambam recalled, because he was sure the man had a gun in his pocket and was ready to use it. By getting the man to identify himself, he would enable his friend and colleague, Joe Shachter, who was monitoring the conversation from a nearby car, to record the name of his assailant if things went wrong, Rambam said.

Although he was able to defuse the situation, it was one of two times he felt he was in any danger during the interviews.

Rambam's "investigation" and his claim that some of the men virtually admitted to war crimes, have drawn international attention to the government's handling of alleged war criminals in Canada. His story was a major feature item in the Jerusalem Post magazine, and he was accompanied on 20 of his interviews by reporters from that publication or others. He has been extensively interviewed by the Canadian media, and last week a CBC television crew was in his Toronto hotel room, filming him for a documentary.

Rambam said he is pleasantly surprised at the media attention his efforts have garnered in Canada, since the presence of war criminals and the government's inaction are already well documented.

Nevertheless, he believes "this is an issue that deserves a glaring media spotlight" to expose "the shameful inaction" of the Canadian government.

A fast-talking New Yorker who says he's a descendent of the great medieval rabbinic sage, Rambam exudes self-confidence.

A self-styled Jewish activist going back to his teenage years, Rambam was a member of the U.S. Jewish Defence League (JDL) in the days when lobbying on behalf of Soviet Jewry was the most pressing issue on the Jewish agenda.

At age 19, he and other JDLers were arrested and charged with transporting explosives across state lines. He was convicted but the conviction was later "expunged" and did not form a barrier to his obtaining a licence as a private investigator, he said.

His JDL ties led him to Canada many times in the mid-1980s and in 1983, he helped provide security for author John Loftus, who was promoting a book on Belarussian-Nazi collaborators.

At the program where Loftus appeared, Rambam was approached by someone he declined to identify and was given a list of 80 Nazi suspects. He filed it away, he says, with some embarrassment, only to retrieve it about 10 years later. As "a lark" he and some associates tried to track down some of the names. To their amazement, they found three of the individuals in one afternoon. The next day, they found others for a total of 12.

In January 1995, he decided to go full bore at the project. Obtaining a list of names from the Israel office of the Simon Wiesenthal Centre and from Yad Vashem, he and his associates eventually located 157 alleged war criminals and interviewed 62. One-third were found through the phone book, one-third through public records and the last third required the use of more extensive investigative techniques.

Taking more time to consider his words, Rambam said "I believe it's out and out wrong, perhaps even chillul HaShem... for any Jew to let them [war criminals] live comfortably and at peace."

He plans to return to Canada later this month to turn over the tapes and other information to the Canadian Jewish Congress. After examining the materials, Congress plans to pass them along to Canadian law enforcement officials.

Crown summarizes Kalejs case

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Justice Department lawyers have filed a 117-page document summarizing the facts and legal arguments they believe disqualify alleged war criminal Konrads Kalejs from remaining in Canada.

The document filed with the Immigration and Refugee Board recounts the mountain of evidence presented before adjudicator Anthony Iozzo in which Kalejs is repeatedly described as a senior lieutenant and company commander in the notorious Arajs Kommando in wartime Latvia.

The document alleges that units under Kalejs' command probably were involved in the wholesale massacre of the Jews of Riga in November and December 1941; were involved in the massacre of civilians in the Russian villages of Saniki and Zabolotye; were stationed at the Porkova concentration camp when Jews were killed; and were involved in guarding and escorting Latvians imprisoned at the Salaspils concentration camp where prisoners were dehumanized, murdered and worked to death.

The document goes on to say that given the weight of documentary evidence and testimony of former comrades in arms, three of whom identified Kalejs from a photo spread, Kalejs' denial of involvement in war crimes is not credible. It points out numerous inconsistencies in his testimony and, in effect, accuses him of lying.

In one example, the document recounts how in 1984 Kalejs left the United States in anticipation of the start of legal proceedings to deport him. "When he returned in 1985, Kalejs went to Florida and registered at a hotel on Treasure Island under a false name (C. Michaelson). Kalejs had documents in his car in the false name and he failed to report to Immigration and Naturalization officials."

The document goes on to note that "at this inquiry [in Toronto], Kalejs described how it was his sister, Olga Michaelson, who had registered at the motel on Treasure Island as she was on vacation. Kalejs allegedly did not register at the hotel but stayed in Michaelson's room and this erroneously led the police to believe he had registered under [another name] and that he had assumed a false identity to escape apprehension."

Kalejs also told the Toronto inquiry that his sister died some time between his stay at the motel and his April 1985 U.S. bail hearing.

However, "on March 1, 1984, under oath, Kalejs testified that his sister Olga had died the previous year. In other words, Kalejs' evidence given at a time when he had no cause to lie, was that Olga Kalejs Michaelson died in 1983, not in 1985. Kalejs later stated his sister was still working at that time and she was on vacation when they met at the Treasure Island motel. When confronted with this inconsistency, Kalejs admitted his sister died before 1985 and he then stated it was not his sister who was staying at the motel but a non-relative — the step-daughter of his deceased sister by her second marriage."

Another inconsistency pointed out by Crown lawyers Donald MacIntosh and Bonnie Boucher was Kalejs' claim that he came to Canada partly to gather evidence to reopen his U.S. case, but that he had not yet attempted to do so.

"Contrary to the evidence presented by Kalejs at this inquiry, in 1992 Kalejs applied to the Federal Court of Appeal, 6th Circuit, to reopen his immigration case...The Court dismissed that application," the document notes.

A significant segment of the Justice Department's document addresses Kalejs' attack on evidence gathered in the former Soviet Union and his introduction into evidence of a videotape prepared by the Schiller Institute in which the case of John Demjanjuk was discussed. (Demjanjuk was extradited from the United States to Israel where he stood trial as Ivan the Terrible, a guard at Treblinka. He was found guilty at trial, but the Israeli Supreme Court later cleared him of the charges.)

The Schiller Institute, the Justice Department lawyers point out, was created by Lyndon LaRouche and his wife as part of "the LaRouche political cult...LaRouche espouses an extremism that defies categorization but which encompasses a virulent anti-Semitism...and paranoia." A U.S. court found that the LaRouche group "have linked prominent Jews and Jewish organizations both in this country and abroad with the rise of Hitler, Nazis and fascism, the international drug trade and a myriad of purported conspiracies..."

The document goes on to address allegations contained in the tape, including the claim that documents from the Soviet Union have been forged, saying in no war crime case yet have such documents been found to be false. It also notes that Kalejs did not request to have the documents in his case examined independently.

The Kalejs case is due to reconvene on Jan. 20 when additional oral arguments will be presented.

Davis to help update Immigration Act

By RON CSILLAG
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The federal government has tapped a former national executive director of Jewish Immigrant Aid Services (JIAS) to overhaul the Immigration Act.

Susan Davis and two other members of the review committee have until Dec. 31, 1997 to recommend changes to the act, which many immigration advocates have described as a mess.

The committee's mandate is to simplify and streamline the rules, Immigration Minister Lucienne Robillard said recently. She called the current act complicated and lacking in coherence.

The federal statute has been amended 30 times since it was proclaimed in 1978.

The committee will also look at ministerial discretion, which is used to overturn previous decisions in an immigration or refugee case — usually for those deemed otherwise inadmissible to enter Canada.

Davis told The CJN the task force is bound to touch on another controversial area — refugees.

This is not the first time Ottawa has tapped Davis to review immigration rules. In 1994, she and Toronto immigration lawyer Lorne Waldman authored a report harshly critical of the government's policy on appeals for unsuccessful refugee claimants.

Entitled The Quality of Mercy, the report said federal rules "have failed miserably" and it slammed Canada's policy for its "inhumanity and financial waste."

The report spurred then immigration minister Sergio Marchi to change the rules on refugee claim appeals.

This time, Davis and her fellow committee members have a much wider mandate to revamp all the legislation. "The list is inexhaustible. We will be examining virtually every aspect of the act," she said.

Immigration has always been central to the Jewish community, Davis pointed out. "We are an immigrant community. So every issue raised [by the committee] will be of some import [to Jews].

"We look at the Immigration Act as a reflection of how we treat the stranger. Does it reflect our values?"

Davis said there is concern among Jewish immigration workers that Ottawa is not paying enough attention to family reunification.

The minister said that next year, the Liberals will hold the line on overall immigration levels at between 195,000 and 220,000 — the same as in 1996 and down from the roughly 300,000 a year promised in the red book of government policies.

Robillard said Ottawa is not raising the number of immigrants for fear of "a social backlash."

JIAS expressed concern at that, saying the government was caving in to public canards about immigrants.

Davis says her work will be apolitical. "We're going to be looking at whether the act meets its own objectives," she said.

Economic refugees unnecessary: Crispo

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to the CJN

TORONTO – John Crispo, professor of political economy at the University of Toronto, and Mendel Green, immigration lawyer, recently faced off in a lively debate on immigration at the Beth Sholom Synagogue on Eglinton Ave. W.

Asserting that immigrants coming to Canada in recent decades have been of diminished benefit, Crispo said that Canadian citizenship is a privilege, not a right, and should be granted using a point system "solely on our needs, not anyone else's."

"I'm getting a little sick and tired of people who come here to be hyphenated Canadians," he said. "I don't mind if they teach their children about what they believe and what they stand for, but I don't believe that public funds should be spent on multiculturalism."

Crispo argued that Canada should accept no economic refugees and only its "fair share" of political refugees. "We can't take all the world's refugees; there are hundreds of millions of them," he said.

As well, he cited statistics alleging that one-sixth of all welfare payments made in Canada go to immigrants who have been abandoned by their sponsors.

"If I were in charge, I'd send them right back, and I'd send the sponsors back too, for misleading us."

The economics professor, who writes occasional newspaper columns on immigration and other matters, said that Canada should take a hard line on deporting undesirables and questioned the present policy of giving full legal rights to "anybody who lands on our shores by whatever means."

"I feel strongly about this country. I love it dearly and I want a rich diversity of people here," he said. "I'm not a racist."

Green defended the role of immigrants in building Canada and in strengthening our economy, and noted that business-class immigrants, especially those from Hong Kong have brought wealth to Canada. And he pointed out that, contrary to what Crispo had claimed, a point system for immigrants is rigorously applied, and immigration levels are set annually, "depending on the state of the economy and market needs."

He also noted that Canada only takes in roughly 26,000 political refugees each year.

Immigrants are often better educated than, and are employed and self-employed at the same rates as Canadians, Green said. Immigrants have revitalized urban neighborhoods, and have enhanced our ability to do business with Pacific rim and other countries, he added.

He acknowledged that some sponsored immigrants have been abandoned, saying, "In this recession, a small percentage of people have defaulted. But when you default, you can never sponsor again."

Green said that Canadians of an earlier era barred shiploads of Jews from entering the country, as well as a boatload of Sikhs who were sent back to India and later killed. Then he criticized Crispo for his supposedly uneven grasp of Canada's immigration system.

"Be careful," Green warned. "There are racists out there who will use your words improperly."

Political acrimony in Israel is nothing new, Emunah told

By LEILA SPEISMAN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — People in the Diaspora shouldn't focus on the seeming acrimony of Israeli politics, according to Moshe Schwartz, an acting assistant district attorney in the Brooklyn District Attorney's Office.

"Insulting each other has always been a part of Israeli politics," he said, citing as an example David Ben-Gurion's referring to Menachem Begin only as "the Knesset member on the left of," rather than by name.

Schwartz previously worked for the Consulate General of Israel, and has ghostwritten for Ambassador Colette Avital and Maj.-Gen. Uzi Narkiss.

He was speaking at an Emunah dinner honoring his grandparents, Evelyn and Murray Hoffman. The event was held at Shaarei Shomayim Synagogue.

There is a deep division in Israel between secular Zionists and the mainly central Orthodox, Likud supporters, Schwartz said.

After the 1973 war, Schwartz said, the Israeli population lost faith in the ability of the government to protect them, and so turned to the Likud party.

Since then, there has been a seesawing back and forth between Labor and Likud, as people became more disillusioned with each successive government's inability to handle the peace process.

The Orthodox are now the true Zionists, Schwartz said, citing a poll which showed that 99 percent of the modern Orthodox population, the ones who serve in the army, were anxious to serve in combat units, while fully 50 percent of the non-Orthodox did not want to. As well, he said, 40 percent of the officers in the Israeli army are Orthodox, even though they constitute only 10 percent of the military population.

The Orthodox voted for Benjamin Netanyahu in the last election, Schwartz said, "not because he is a poster boy for Torah values," but because he understands that "Jews have to live in Israel because it is ours," in contrast to former prime minister Shimon Peres, who believes, he said, in a state that just happens to have Jews in it.

The Israeli electorate is a sophisticated one, he said, with one of the highest percentages of voters, newspaper readers and army veterans. "They understand security issues, and they understand the rest of the world."

Funds raised for the dinner were used to build a new recreation hall at Neve Michael, a childrens' village in Pardess Chana. Originally built to house orphans brought to Israel by youth aliyah, it now serves mainly youngsters from troubled homes.

The Hoffmans were praised by son Dr. Samuel Silverberg and sons-in-law Dr. William Schwartz and Muttie Stein. Dinner chair was Shoshana Kurtz. Entertainment was by Marvin Rosenshein.

Evelyn Hoffman responded to the honors, saying that all those present were deserving of being honored, because of their contributions to the cause of Emunah and especially of Neve Michael.

Peter Bronfman to get medal posthumously

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO —Peter Bronfman, 67, a gentle and modest member of a well known Canadian Jewish family, died at his home in Toronto recently after a battle with cancer.

The funeral took place Dec. 1 at Benjamin's Park Memorial Chapel.

Bronfman died one day before he was to be presented with the Order of Canada by Governor General Romeo LeBlanc.

Bronfman' s family will be invited to take part in an investiture ceremony in Ottawa next year.

The citation accompanying the Order of Canada pays tribute to Bronfman's patronage of the arts, charities, hospitals and universities in Montreal and Toronto.

It says his focus on smaller agencies has ensured the survival of a wide range of services for the homeless, inner-city children and teenage mothers.

Peter Frederick Bronfman was born in Montreal in 1929, a son of Allan Bronfman and nephew of Samuel Bronfman, owner of the Seagram Company. He attended the Lawrenceville School in Lawrenceville, N.J., and received a bachelor's degree from Yale University in 1952.

For more than 40 years, with his older brother Edward, he controlled the Edper Group which at one time or another included some of Canada's largest and best known corporations. Its annual revenues today exceed $18 billion.

Bronfman and his brother, Edward, were forced to sell their block of shares in Seagram's for some $15 million to their Montreal-based cousins in the 1960s. Peter and Edward were sometimes referred to as the "poor cousins" of the family that ran the Seagram empire. .

Over the years he became more and more involved in Jewish communal activities and at one time served as president of Montreal's Jewish General Hospital.

A man who liked to keep out of the public eye, Bronfman was known to show up at glitzy Toronto affairs, tieless, wearing a cardigan..

One of his great loves was hockey. He and his brother owned the Montreal Canadiens from 1971 to 1978, years in which the team won the Stanley Cup four times. He often visited players after games but never interfered in the running of the team.

Surviving are his third wife, Lynda; his children Linda, Bruce and Brenda, as well as their mother and his first wife, Diane Bronfman, and six grandchildren, Marissa, Michael, Ryan, Daniel, Mallorie and Joshua. He also leaves his brother Edward, and his second wife, the former Theodora Reitsma.

TORONTO — Two and a half years ago, entrepreneur Freddy Faust met with counterparts from Israel involved in the home fashion and textiles business. With free trade on his mind and having seen the high quality of some Israeli merchandise, Faust believed the time was ripe to begin introducing Israeli fabrics and bed linens to the Canadian market.

As an owner of Revelle Home Fashions, Faust forged close business ties with Israeli counterparts and introduced the Israeli products to Canada under the Revelle name. Since then, they've become popular items on the Canadian scene. Faust believes that with the implementation of Canada-Israel Free Trade Agreement (CIFTA) and the resulting lower tariffs, prices will come down and Israeli products will continue to be popular.

Faust presented his optimistic evaluation of the potential for Canada-Israel trade at a recent dinnertime meeting of the international law section of the Canadian Bar Association — Ontario. He was preceded by Yael Varsano-Barzillay, Israeli trade commissioner and economic counsel.

Varsano-Barzillay described the tremendous strides taken by Israel's economy in recent years, including a 5.8 percent average annual growth over the last five. In 1995, Israel's gross domestic product reached $87 billion (US) and the country now enjoys a per capita income level of $15,650 US, comparable to Spain and greater than Ireland. Unemployment has dropped to 6.3 percent for 1995, down from 12 percent in 1992, she noted.

In recent years, Israel has been able to successfully integrate its highly skilled and educated work force, develop an advanced infrastructure in communications, transportation and banking, and increase its trade in an unprecedented manner, Varsano-Barzillay said.

Despite the country's relatively small size and correspondingly small domestic market, Israel imports $37 billion US in goods and services, she said.

"Israel's trade continues to grow in an unprecedented manner in the emerging and booming markets in Asia and Latin America," she added.

On the domestic front, the government of Israel is introducing a privatization policy in which state-owned companies such as El Al Israel Airlines, Israel Aircraft Industries, a portion of Bezeq (the state telephone company) and Mekorot (Israel's water works) will be sold off, she said.

These factors, combined with the removal of non-tariff barriers and the negotiation of free trade agreements with the United States, the European Union and with several Eastern European countries has allowed the duty-free flow of Israeli goods, boosting the Israeli economy, she said.

The Israeli economy has become so hot that in the past year, multinational firms have begun acquiring Israeli businesses or entering into joint ventures with private companies, she added.

Under CIFTA, tariffs will be removed from industrial products, leaving only a few exceptions. Varsano-Barzillay explained the rules regarding origin of goods, based on the "tariff shift" model, noting that only those goods considered to originate in the participating countries can enter free of duties.

Lawyer Ed Morgan, who has clients who do business in Israel, pointed out that CIFTA was modelled on the North American Free Trade Agreement (NAFTA), even though it was designed to apply to three countries.

He said the rules of origin and the dispute resolution mechanism are two of CIFTA's key elements and noted that despite Israel's trade agreements with the United States and the European Union, Israel is still not being used by either of those two bodies as a tariff-free "bridge" to the other. The rules of origin require some value be added to the product in Israel, he suggested.

Applying the lessons

The Organization of Security and Cooperation in Europe (OSCE) had its origins in Helsinki more than two decades ago during the first tentative days of detente, when the Cold War was still being waged, and proxy states still paid in blood the price of the conflicts they fought for their benefactors.

At the time, some political observers stated that the creation of the OSCE was the quid demanded by the West for agreeing to the hegemonic quo imposed by the East.

Looking back, it seems hardly relevant now. The Cold War has ended. Proxy states no longer fight their arms suppliers' wars. There is far greater security and a great deal more cooperation between eastern and western Europe today than there has ever been before in this century. As history ultimately proved, the weight of the iron in the totalitarian curtain caused its own collapse, destroyed the economy and made the people unwilling to carry the burden across their necks any longer.

Last week Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu participated in the two-day summit meeting of the OSCE in Lisbon, Portugal. Taking advantage of the occasion and of the opportunity to address leaders from the 54 nations assembled, he reminded his audience that the OSCE forged ahead despite the many contradictions that existed in the geopolitically competitive, even hostile, East-West superpower structure.

He spoke about the need to learn from the founding of the OSCE 21 years ago and apply the lessons to the modern day search for security and cooperation in the Middle East. Specifically, the prime minister mentioned three lessons.

"The first lesson the Middle East can learn from the Helsinki process is that diplomacy must be based on agreed fundamental norms. The most important of these is the absolute commitment of all parties to refrain from the threat or use of force in the resolution of political differences.

"The second lesson of Helsinki is that the broader the peace, the broader the security achieved. For peace and security to become a fact in Europe it had to reach from the Atlantic to the Ural Mountains...For a solid, comprehensive security to prevail in the Middle East, our quest for peace must cover the entire region from Morocco to the Gulf.

"The third lesson of Helsinki is that contact between former adversaries must remain constant...Above all the parties must understand that once a decision for peace is made, all other options for settling differences must be discarded."

The prime minister's message from the European podium came at a most appropriate time. Many political commentators have recently observed that the unceasing criticism directed at Israel from the Arabs over the past few weeks seems to be a "well-orchestrated campaign," which in the words of Uri Elitzur of Yediot Aharanot, "are deliberately and cynically regressing the situation to the brink of war. Arafat extends the Hebron crisis; Assad moves troops and releases reports of gas weapons. Mubarak vilifies and mongers a verbal war. King Hussein expresses deep concern. Each according to his strength walks exactly to the brink and no more."

His message was an important one emphasizing that peace is found as much in the process as in the result. If there is to be any progress in the search for peace, carping about disagreements must eventually yield to trying to resolve them.

As the prime minister himself noted, "A peace built on norms, comprehensiveness and constant dialogue may not lead to instant peace, but it has the best chance of ensuring...the kind of peace that our children will celebrate every day of their lives."

If the students are willing, the lessons should not be too hard to apply.

Congress already acting on deficits

The From the editor's desk column, "Adapting to deficit reduction policies" (CJN, Nov. 28), reported that Morris Zbar of the Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto urged federations to get into the business of "government relations, coalition-building, advocacy and social policy planning." Zbar's call, it was stated, grew specifically out of the Ontario experience of severe budget cuts by the provincial government.

It is precisely this experience in Ontario, however, which back in November 1995 prompted the Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region and Toronto's federation jointly to address the impact of provincial government policies which sought to rationalize expenditures and infrastructure in pursuit of deficit reduction. The division of labor was clear: Congress organized an ethnic and faith communities' coalition and acted as the liaison to government while the federation analyzed the impact of the cuts on the Jewish community and worked with the Jewish communal agencies. Both Congress and the federation were integrally involved in the drafting of a consensual coalition position paper for presentation to government.

One is left wondering, therefore, why it is at all necessary in Canada for federations to take on functions on behalf of the Jewish community which Canadian Jewish Congress, both nationally and regionally, effectively has been exercising for decades.

The good work that honorees do

In his protracted diabtribe insulting individuals who accept to be honored on behalf of communal fundraising organizations, Shel Krakofsky is slapping the face that feeds. Having worked in the community for over 16 years with thousands of dedicated volunteers, I have only respect and admiration for those who willingly give their name, their time and their money for the communal good.

Without them the poor would be poorer, the sick would be sicker and the elderly more isolated and alone than ever. I notice that Krakofsky is actually a physician in Komoka, Ont. Well, I don't know about your town, but in Montreal, honorees augment health institution coffers to the tune of hundreds of thousands of dollars.

This money buys much needed and expensive medical equipment, spruces up hospital waiting rooms for cancer patients, shelters abused mothers and their children, subsidizes Jewish education and ensures quality services and health-care programs for all. These honorees also raise money for similar good works in Israel and anywhere that individuals need a helping hand.

Reading Hebron an offensive exercise

Jason Sherman recently appeared on CBC's The Lead, and stated that although he has never been to Israel, this should not disqualify him from expressing his views on the relationship between Arabs and Jews there, nor even from writing a play on the subject. This he has done in Reading Hebron.

By the same logic, one does not have to see Sherman's play to know that it is more a commentary on the playwright's spoiled upbringing on the golden-paved streets of Toronto than on the situation in the Middle East. Not only does it speak to his lack of understanding of issues of personal responsibility and sacrifice, the historical record and basic notions of Judaism, it also comments (in the most ironic fashion) on that peculiarly Jewish penchant for self-flagellation and the equally regrettable "What will the gentiles think?" attitude of too many Jews who have drifted too far from their heritage.

If Sherman requires assistance in understanding the absurdity of questioning his own responsibility for Baruch Goldstein's murderous actions, I would suggest that he ask some of his fellow Canadians how many of them assume responsibility for Paul Bernardo, Carla Homolka et al.; indeed I would encourage him to consider his own responsibility in these cases. And then let him ask if it is worthy of a play.

Name of metro station just a blip

After the TV news showed a man calling for the changing of the name of Lionel Groulx metro station, the radio talk shows were clamoring away the next day, as callers supported or rejected the idea.

We have enough to worry about with what's going on now in the world without digging up past conflicts that will only divide us. None of us were angels then, neither are we now. Besides it would be too expensive and impractical to change all the street signs and monuments in Montreal and in the whole world that were named after men, some of whom, I'm sure, weren't too crazy about Jews and other people.

We have to realize that we are very lucky we have made as much progress in human relations as we have since those crazy days of long ago. I think it will take much more to fight racism and other present day ills than fighting about changing the name of a Metro station.

Rabbi David Buzaglo: great poet and scholar

By CANTOR AVIV OUANOUNOU

Music and liturgy have been a part of Jewish worship since we started to pray.

The book of Exodus beautifully records the exultant song that Moses and the Israelites sang in praise of G-d after they crossed the Red Sea. Music was used to worship G-d by the Levi'im in the Beit Hamiskdash (the Holy Temple) and by King David in his book of Tehilim (Psalms).

In our days, when we think of serving G-d through music, we may think of the synagogue where our cantors lead us in music and prayers. Moroccan Jewry is particularly famous for its rich liturgical music that includes many prayers and piutim (poems) from the book of Shir Yedidou, many of which were composed by great medieval and Middle Age poets.

Rabbi David Buzaglo, one of the greatest poets and composers of our time, was born in 1903 in Setat, a village near Rabat, the Moroccan capital. He was a member of the well-known Buzaglo family, whose lineage included many great rabbis and scholars.

From an early age it was evident that David Buzaglo had unusual attributes. While other children were busy with games, David was intent on the study of the Torah. He studied in various Torah institutions in Casablanca and the breadth of his knowledge became well known to all the rabbis in the city at that time. The rapidity of his learning and his ability to concentrate for extended periods was particularly noteworthy.

He studied the Talmud and most of the commentaries. Wherever a question in the Gemara arose in any rabbinical institution in Casablanca, students would approach David, who was still a child, for the answer. But he became particularly famous for his kol arev (beautiful voice) and his ability to learn difficult pieces of music in a very short time. He had a phenomenal memory and everything he learned literally "lived in his mind." He studied liturgy with a prominent Moroccan rabbi and poet named Hacham Haim Benatar from Marakesh.

In a short time he learned all the piyutim in Shir Yedidout (about 550), and had most of them memorized. Furthermore, he was a master in Arabic music, particularly the Andalousian music (composed of 11 different complex modulations) which was known to only a selsect few Arab composers in North Africa.

In addition to his mastery of musical liturgy, Rabbi Buzaglo was known as one of the first Hebrew teachers in Morocco at the beginning of the 20th century. In 1920, he was the secretary of Chevrat David Hamelech, an organization whose goal was to revive and strengthen the Hebrew language in Morocco. Until he lost his sight in 1949, he taught dikduk (Hebrew grammar), Hebrew language and Judaic studies at Chevrat David Hamelech schools and at the schools of Em Habanim.

He also composed hundreds of songs in Hebrew, Arabic and Jeudou-Arabic, in which he used tunes from the rich Andalusian music which he cherished and loved. The subject of these piyutim varied from holy songs about galut (exile) and geulah (redemption) to more modern ones that dealt with Yisrael and the unity of Jerusalem after the Six Day War of 1967. He wrote about emunah (faith), stressing the importance of complete and ultimate faith in HaShem, and of his prayers for Mashiach. The coming of the Mashiach was the central hope of his life and could be heard in all his songs.

The Rabbi at one of his readings.

Listening to his crying voice reciting the kinot (lamentations) of Tisha b'Av was a very emotional experience. When he was reading the lamentations of the destruction of the Temple, his voice shook with grief.

He also wrote many poems touching on personal tragedies of his life and the lives of the Jews of Morocco. One such example is the famous ksida (a form of poetry in the Moroccan liturgy) about the earthquake that shook the city Agadir in 1960, where more than 5,000 people lost their lives.

The collection of Moroccan piyutim called in Hebrew, Shirat Habakashot, was significantly influenced by Rabbi Buzaglo. Devout Moroccan Jews have the custom of waking up early in the morning on the Shabbatot between Sukkot and Pesach, and gathering in the synagogues to sing the piyutim of Shirat Habakashot. The piyutim are organized into chapters according to the weekly Torah portions. Preceding the piyutim is Tikun Chatzot, a prayer recited in memory of the Holy Temple in Jerusalem. Rabbi Buzaglo mastered all of the beautiful songs of the paytanim (liturgical poets) and he regularly functioned as the mekadem (the paytan who led the group).

His beautiful voice and his exceptional knowledge of traditional Moroccan music, both Jewish and Muslim, made Rabbi Buzgalo a legend among the people of Morocco. He often sang on Moroccan national radio and performed for royalty. He gained appreciation and followers from all levels of the population, both Jews and Muslims. Hundreds of people used to wake up early on Saturdays to find a seat close to Rabbi Buzaglo in the synagogue, which was always full.

Particularly noteworthy was his officiating as the chazzan on the Yamim Noraim (the High Holy Days), when his prayers brought tears to the eyes of many of the congregants and he brought special warmth to the service. It was a great sight to see Rabbi Buzaglo wearing his white gelaba (a tradtional moroccan garment), the trembling of the Day of Judgment clearly on his face. He was instrumental in the development of many of the tunes in the High Holy Day machzor used in Sephardi synagogues.

In time, Rabbi Buzaglo's reputation as a man devoted to the poor spread and he was entrusted with money for charities to aid needy families, a role he always undertook modestly and without seeking recognition.

In the 1950s and '60s, wave after wave of North African Jews moved to Eretz Israel. Rabbi Buzaglo also decided to fulfil his dream to settle in Israel. In 1965, he emigrated to Israel and lived in Kiryat Yam.

The news of his arrival in Israel spread and leaders of many communities gathered to greet him and welcome him to the Holy Land.

In Israel he continued his mission in teaching Shir Yedidout to the next generation, and continued to compose songs that were quickly adapted by many of his students, who saw him as the highest (and only) authority when questions arose on any subject.

Shortly after his arrival in Israel, Rabbi Buzaglo became very ill, but never abandoned chazzanut or the teaching of the piyutim. His memory was clear until the last moments of his life.

A story told by his followers is a testament to the rabbi's strength of mind during his final moments. It is customary in the Moroccan tradition to read the prophecy of Yechezkel on the death bed of a great rabbi. The head of the chevra kadisha who was reading the passage skipped one verse. Rabbi David signalled the omission and the correction was made right away.

As the bitter news spread that the great Rabbi Buzaglo had passed away, grief and sorrow poured into every part of the world where faithful talmidim (students) and maaritzim (followers) were found. That Friday morning, erev Shabbat Parshat Reeh, thousands of people from all over Israel and the world gathered to pay their last respects as Rabbi David Buzgalo returned to his Maker, a crystal clear soul without blemish, leaving behind hundreds of students.

Cantor Ouanounou is the chazzan of Magen David Sephardic Congregation in Toronto.

Opinions

Middle East is an unstable region

The "new Middle East," if it develops in the future, will depend as much on internal developments in the Arab countries as it will on their relations with Israel. Indeed, for those Arab countries that have embarked on a course of political dialogue with Israel, the decision was part of an effort to cope with a deteriorating internal situation. For Egypt, for example, the state of war had to be terminated in order to attract capital, foreign aid and entrepreneurs. The price of conflict had become unacceptable in terms of the domestic situation.

By Shira Herzog

Economic data in the Middle East points to a gloomy future for Arab societies. The forecast for the next decade is for 0.4 percent per capita growth annually. Between 1970 and 1990, wages rose by six percent on average, compared to 150 percent in East Asia. In terms of population growth, the Muslim East will double itself within 25 years. By the year 2025, the region will have 600 million people, six times the population of 1948, when the State of Israel was established.

Arab intellectuals and social scientists are debating this picture of weakness intensely. Some observers note that since the great debate of the '40s and early '50s, following the great defeat in the 1948 war, the current soul-searching for causes and remedies is the most agonizing experienced in Arab society.

Under the early military socialist regimes, best exemplified by President Gamal Abdel Nasser of Egypt, Arabs experienced rising expectations. Their expectations were lowered under the technocratic regimes of the '70s. When these regimes failed to produce a solution, expectations declined even further.

Today, the most dynamic sector in Arab societies is the new class of entrepreneurs and speculators. While these "new Arabs" are at the forefront of the push for peace with Israel as part of their general strategy to integrate into the global economy, they have a negative impact on other sectors in Arab countries. Governments' huge bureaucracies are being challenged, and the attendant decline in salaries causes resentment. The middle classes and the intelligentsia in these societies are suffering as the new speculators become wealthy, thereby providing fertile ground for the Islamic movement. Since none of the Arab regimes has been able to embark on significant profound economic reforms, the new entrepreneurial class can succeed even as the circle of poverty widens — especially in urban centres. In turn, the old military and security elites are protecting their power bases.

For reforms to have real impact in Arab societies, huge sums of money are required for infrastructure development and education. Some estimates put these amounts at $1,000 billion. Funds of this magnitude are not available from regional or foreign sources, and the huge Arab labor force has nowhere to turn for work, while jobs internally are simply not there. Egypt alone needs 750,000 new jobs annually. For the new Arab entrepreneurs to succeed in making their case for peace, they have to succeed at home by displaying a broader social responsibility than they have demonstrated hitherto.

Given the magnitude of these problems, there is virtually nothing that Israel can do to improve the lot of Arab societies. With a GDP larger than that of its neighbors combined, increased trade and a flow of goods and services can do little but fuel the existing resentment of Israel's economic power. The historic view of Israel as a tool of the West has been translated into a view of Israel as a dominant economic superpower seeking to expand its sphere of influence in the region. Today, most Israeli economic analysts acknowledge that the benefit of peace will be not in the expanding circle of trade with Arab countries, but with the opening up of new international markets that were closed during the years of hostility. Most of these benefits are already evident as a result of the preliminary progress with the Palestinians. The concern of the Israeli business community, as the pace of talks has slowed down, is that these new markets and opportunities may be jeopardized.

An Arab writer, George Kharam, recently wrote that the region runs the risk of ending up with "peace without peace." Ironically, that is also the fear of many Israelis. Unfortunately, in the Middle East, peace between Arabs and Isralis is not a guarantee of stability and prosperity. The question is the price of the alternative for both Israelis and Arabs. Both sides pay a price — albeit different — for sustaining the conflict. As they face their options, they must weigh the relative costs of conflict and peace, and choose their course.

The gambling bug

I recently spent a few days in Detroit and, of course, read the local newspaper. I noticed that a fair amount of space was given to the gambling casinos that were about to locate themselves there, and the public discussion occupied itself primarily with the location rather than with the desirability of having a gambling institution in the city's midst.

By Rabbi Gunther Plaut

That gave me the opportunity of looking up figures about American gambling and I found that in 1996 the citizens of that great country will spend more on legal wagers than they will spend on groceries to feed themselves and their families. This represents a 3,000 percent increase in gambling expenditures in the last 20 years. I do not have access to the Canadian figures, but I suspect that our percentage is no less — and possibly even more. The recent publicity surrounding the opening of a gambling casino at Rama, Ont., was directed even at communities located 100 kilometres or more from the new casino.

Students of the social implications of gambling are agreed that, besides addicted gamblers (about two percent), wagering at casinos, horse races and lottery wickets is done by ordinary people — and most of them are from a stratum of society that can ill afford to live on the hope of winning when there is hardly enough cash to buy the groceries.

In consequence, I have always been opposed to community-run affairs that prey on the gambling instincts of the masses, and I say this knowing full well that there are many religious institutions in North America who obtain a significant portion of their income from such activities. (Only when Native people — themselves among the poorest elements of society — are the beneficiaries, am I inclined to look the other way.)

Lest you get the idea that gambling is something that is not terribly prevalent amongst Jews, think again. It has been a part of our society from its very beginning. Open your Bible and look at Chapter 14 of the Book of Judges, and you will find that already Samson engaged in betting. If you have an Encyclopedia Judaica at home, open it up to the seventh volume and look under "Gambling." In turn, the article will open your eyes. For instance, you will read of old rules that deal with professional gamblers — the Mishnah disqualifies them from giving testimony. Jewish tradition has generally looked askance at betting, though occasionally, as on Purim or Chanukah, the strictures against games of chance were let down. But on the whole both in the Jewish ethical literature and in today's Israeli law, gambling is discouraged and considered not to be in keeping with the spirit of our faith.

Part of our negative attitute has been the recognition that a portion of society — those who could least afford to lose money — are usually the ones who hope that gambling will improve their lot. Since the chances are against them, they will likely be further impoverished. This knowledge is no secret, but communities blithely go ahead and deal with their deficits in a manner that helps one segment of society and hurts another. To be sure, raising one's voice against communal lotteries is like shouting into the wind. But that does not relieve me from shouting.

Supreme Court decision regrettable

The recent 7-2 decision of the Canadian Supreme Court, which legitimated the Ontario government's policy of funding Roman Catholic schools but not those of any other religious denomination, is unfortunate. From the perspective of this non-lawyer, the two-part reasoning summarized in news accounts of the judgment seems unusually narrow and flawed. One part seems to rest on an interpretation of Section 93 of the Constitution, which guarantees funding to Ontario Catholic schools. This is seen as a specific "historical compromise," and not as a "guarantee of fundamental freedoms." The judgment then argues against extending the original Catholic model to other groups using Section 2(a) guaranteeing of freedom of religion, because that would suggest that one section of the Constitution is "violative" of the other.

By Morton Weinfeld

If this reasoning becomes commonplace, the notion of an evolving Constitution would disappear, and moral perspectives common in 1867, or earlier, would trump the Charter of Rights passed in 1982. Strict constructionists — the Karaites of legal philosophy — would be delighted. It also suggests ominously that reasons of state or political expediency — like the "historical compromise" needed to push through Confederation in 1867 — might also be used to justify restrictions on fundamental rights and freedoms.

The claim here that one section of the Constitution cannot be "violative" of another is a linguistic red herring, as well as verbal overkill. The rights of Ontario Catholics are in no way limited by extending school funding to other groups. Moreover, the Constitution of Canada, which includes the Charter, is full of sections which could very well, in specific cases, contradict or "violate" one another. These tensions and opposing thrusts are not flaws in the Constitution, they are intrinsic to it. Evolving notions of minority rights require Constitutional interpretation by the Supreme Court.

Courts always are evaluating and determining the limits or extensions of various rights. Imagine an American Supreme Court legitimating continuing slavery, or racial discrimination by some states, by citing the original Constitution's tolerance of slavery as a needed "historical compromise."

The second part of the reasoning is equally troubling. Looking at both sections 2 and 15 (the non-discrimination clause), the court maintains that since the funding of Catholic schools, as opposed to others, is constitutionally mandated, it therefore cannot be subject to a Charter challenge. Moreover, in the view of another justice siding with the majority, denying funding for some religious schools is not the same as removing the fundamental freedom to educate children in religious schools, which remains.

But surely the notion of equal rights means the opportunity for an equal exercise of those rights. Here the state clearly penalizes groups because of their religious affiliation. In fact, the combination of Section 15 and Section 2 (and possibly Section 27 on multiculturalism) elucidates clearly the rights violations found in the current Ontario policy.

But is widening governmental support of private religious schools good public policy? The question may have more resonance in Ontario, Canada's largest and most diverse province. Six provinces offer partial funding to all variety of religious schools. There is no scientific evidence from these six provinces — or from Europe — that governmental funding of religious schools has adversely impacted on collective goals such as good citizenship, tolerance or higher educational attainment. In these six provinces the policy has clearly not led to a destruction of public education.

If all religious schools were of the ultra-religious sorts — monasteries and convents for Catholics, fundamentalist schools for Muslims and Protestants, and ultra-Orthodox yeshivot — and Canadian students were flocking to those schools, there might well be a future problem of weakened social cohesion and Canadian civic purpose. But most religious education — certainly this is true of Jews — offers a wide spectrum of educational options. Schools would have to follow provincial curricula which would preach good citizenship. Private schooling would still be costly, and most students would prefer the public system. Ontario would have little to fear.

When I picked up William Weintraub's new book, City Unique: Montreal Days and Nights in the 1940s and

By Sheldon Kirshner

50s (McClelland & Stewart, $32.50), I expected to be transported into a familiar universe. I was not disappointed.

Weintraub, a Montreal-born journalist, has written a vivid account of a city which, in his view, reached its apogee of influence some three decades ago.

Having been raised in Montreal, and having followed its fortunes since my departure in 1973, I can attest to the worthiness of City Unique, a serious-minded book based on primary and secondary sources.

In writing it, Weintraub – a McGill University graduate and a former reporter for the Gazette – mined the memories of English and French Montrealers, immersed himself in books and old newspapers and delved into dusty archives, including those of the Canadian Jewish Congress and the Jewish Public Library.

Weintraub, who grew up in the Montreal neighborhood of Verdun, credits novelist Mavis Gallant for having inspired him to write the book.

It took him 2½ years to research and write it, and now it is in bookshops across Canada.

City Unique is framed by two events – the tour of King George VI and his wife Queen Elizabeth in 1939 and the death of Quebec Premier Maurice Duplessis in 1959. "For Montreal, the Royal Tour would be the outstanding event in a year that marked the beginning of a new era," he observes. "Within four months, Canada would be at war with Germany. With the war would come an end to the Depression that had impoverished the city for almost 10 years. The year 1939 would usher in two decades of prosperity, growth and a flowering of the arts. Montreal would begin to think of itself as a city unique in the world – bilingual, cosmopolitan, exceedingly handsome and wonderfully odd."

City Unique is replete with eccentric characters like Camillien Houde, who was mayor of Montreal for 18 years; Lili St. Cyr, the femme fatale whose name was synonymous with sin; Max Shapiro, one of the founders of the Ruby Foo's restaurant; Max Wolofsky, the publisher of the Kanader Adler; and Irving Layton, the bohemian poet.

Weintraub, a vivid writer, evokes historic scenes effortlessly. Consider his treatment of VE Day on May 7, 1945: "...thousands headed for the corner of Peel and St. Catherine streets, the focal point of the pandemonium. The crowds there, and in other parts of the city, were so thick that cars could barely get through. People were waving flags, marching, shouting, dancing and kissing. Police moved discreetly, making sure that all the bars and taverns were closed, and that no restaurants were serving alcohol."

Weintraub, 70, the son of of a Romanian Jew who arrived in Montreal via New York at the age of 17, deals extensively with Montreal's Jewish community.

He tells us that Jews constituted the largest group of immigrants in the city, whose wealth was mainly controlled by the Anglo-Scottish elite. By 1941, Montreal was home to 64,000 Jews, three-quarters of whom once lived within a one-mile radius of Jeanne Mance and Villeneuve streets.

The poorest ones lived just east of St. Lawrence – the Main – and the somewhat more affluent ones resided in streets to the west like St. Urbain and Waverley. Outremont, by contrast, was the abode of Jews "with healthy bank accounts," while Westmount was the lair of the wealthiest members of the community.

By the late 1940s and early 1950s, increasing numbers of up-and-coming Jews had vacated the older districts, having moved to Snowdon and Côte des Neiges. More often than not, their places were taken by Jewish refugees, such as my parents, who had been displaced persons in Europe after the Holocaust. During the 1960s, Hampstead and Côte St. Luc came into vogue as popular Jewish neighborhoods.

By Weintraub's count, 14 new synagogues were built or were under construction between 1951 and 1956, all designed to accommodate the rush to newer areas.

City Unique, Weintraub's third book since Why Rock the Boat? and The Underdogs, is vitally alive with nostalgic-laden reminiscences.

He evokes the glory years of the Kanader Adler, the Yiddish daily which became "the mainstay of Yiddish culture in Montreal and a guiding light for immigrants trying to make their way in a bewildering new world."

The Kanader Adler, he adds, served another role as well. By publishing the poetry, fiction and essays of Montreal writers like Sholem Stern and Israel Rabinovitch, it put the city on the Yiddish literary map. Indeed, on the eve of World War II, Montreal ranked with Warsaw and New York as a centre of Yiddish literature.

And during those halcyon years, Montreal spawned a group of world-class Jewish poets, ranging from Leonard Cohen and Louis Dudek to A.M. Klein and Irving Layton.

Being a wide open town where illegal gambling and prostitution flourished, Montreal produced its share of disreputable, seemingly larger than life figures.

Halcyon years

The most famous was probably Harry Ship, a bookie who was the proprietor of the White House casino and the Chez Paree nightclub.

Montrealers who could afford the tab headed for Ruby Foo's, which claimed to be the finest restaurant in the country. There, amid the fragrance of Chinese food, Jewish garment manufacturers, Anglo insurance executives and French Canadian notaries mingled.

When one of the owners retired, the business was run for awhile by his two capable sons, Harold and Bernard Shapiro, who have since become president of Princeton University and principal of McGill.

Anti-Semitism was a factor during this period, and Weintraub is not oblivious to it. He recreates the heyday of Adrien Arcand, Montreal's local fuhrer, and he reminds us of a sermon delivered by a Catholic priest in Ste. Agathe – the summer resort of Montreal Jewry in the Laurentians – who advised the village to rid itself of Jews.

Weintraub also reminds us that "the literary sensation" of 1944 was Earth and Heaven, a novel about anti-Semitism by an unknown Montreal novelist named Gwethalyn Graham. Her book , which was published in the year Hungarian Jewry was decimated by the Nazis, sold 600,000 copies in Canada and the United States and 1.2 million copies worldwide.

By Weintraub's reckoning, Montreal has been in a state of economic decline since the 1960s. "Montreal was such a prosperous and optimistic place when Duplessis died," he said in an interview. "No one ever thought Toronto would catch up."

Weintraub loves Montreal and claims that he wouldn't live anywhere else. "But if I were 20 and starting on a career, I'd leave right away," he admitted, alluding to the spectre of separatism. "Definitely."

Rabbinic Reflections

Candles' significance

By RABBI MARTIN J. BERMAN

The Talmud records that there was a difference of opinion among the rabbis concerning the lighting of the Chanukah menorah, the chanukiah. The School of Shammai insisted that the first night you light eight candles and on each subsequent night you light one less. The School of Hillel maintained that you begin with one light and each night you add one more.

What was the basis of their opinions? According to one rabbi, the School of Shammai wanted to count the number of days left in the holiday, while the School of Hillel was counting the number of days past.

Another explanation was that the School of Shammai was paralleling the decrease in number of sacrifices offered on the holiday of Sukkot. The first day 13 bulls were sacrificed, the second 12 and so on. The School of Hillel said that one should always increase in matters of sanctity and not decrease. In any case, for Shammai the light diminished while for Hillel it increased.

Now in a certain sense, the position of Shammai makes more sense. If the lights commemorate the story of the oil, then each night there was presumably less oil in the Menorah in the Temple until it burned out the last night when new oil was ready. Yet think how that would affect the way we celebrate the holiday. The first night the Chanukah would glow with all of its lamps burning brightly. Then the next night there would be one less lamp lit. Instead of a holiday that built up in joy, it would be a slowly diminishing time, with fewer lights each night. Each night we would see greater darkness in our lives.

Instead, we follow Hillel. Each night we add to the light, each night we push away the darkness and despair.

In the Greek world, there was a notion of a glorious golden age in the past. Everything that was to follow was less, since nothing could ever match the glorious past. Judaism is more optimistic. Sure, there were great things in days gone by, but tomorrow holds the promise of something more. We anticipate the coming of the Messiah, we don't mourn for a past that can never return.

Chanukah celebrates the idea that our ancestors never gave up hope, never fell into despair. Outnumbered by their enemies, they went out to battle and they won. They did not look back thinking that this was the end, but they took heart in the hope that this was a new beginning. They were right and they won the war.

What must they have thought when they entered the Temple and found it a shambles? They could have despaired and said that it was just too much. They did not. Instead they went forward and cleansed the Temple and went to light the Menorah. Then they discovered only a little oil, enough for one day. They again could have given up, but they did not. They took what they had, lit the Menorah and praised God for his deliverance.

That is the most important message of this holiday. Do not give up, do not despair. No matter what the challenges, we the Jewish people, wherever we are, will succeed. There may be setbacks, there may be moments when it looks bleak, whether it be the question of peace in Eretz Yisrael or the survival of our people in the Diaspora. But in the end, we shall triumph. We will continue to add to the light.

Exploring intermarriage

Embracing The Stranger, by Ellen J. McClain (Basic Books, $25 (US)).
Embracing The Covenant, by Rabbi A. Berkowitz & Patti Moskovitz (Jewish Lights Publishing (paperbound), $15.95 (US)).

There are two statistics that sear the consciousness of North American Jews: about half of young Jews marry out of faith, and less than 15 percent of non-Jewish spouses convert to Judaism. It is astonishing that close to one-third of the Jewish community — somewhat less in Canada — is now intermarried and that a solid majority of Jews have a close family member married to a non-Jew. The result of these trends is a community torn between a desire to prevent intermarriage and the recognition that it is a fact of modern Jewish life.

Embracing the Stranger is an informed, eloquent, persuasive appeal for the acceptance of intermarriage. The author, twice married to non-Jews (the second husband now converted to Judaism), asserts that many gentile spouses show more devotion to Jewish values and rituals than Jewish ones. Given the dismal record of Jewish-Jewish households to turn out committed Jews, the author is convinced that many children of mixed marriage are likely to have a better chance to create a positive Jewish future.

Does it make sense, she asks, after we teach our children that everyone is equal and that everyone is a child of God, and after we have given them little more than a modicum of Jewish knowledge and spirituality, to reject them when they bring home a non-Jewish fiancé(e) and tell them, "I'm sorry, this person is not quite good enough."

To focus on the Holocaust, she believes, only reinforces the negative attitude that being Jewish is dangerous. She deplores the attitude of many young Jews who disdain members of the opposite sex and rule them out as marriage partners. This includes the male dismissal of the stereotyped demanding JAP, and the female reaction, "You're exactly what my mother wants me to marry, therefore I can't go out with you."

This provocative, feisty, frequently amusing volume is a necessary book for all concerned with the complex, many-sided issue of Jewish continuity. The reader, however, is left with the feeling that despite outstanding exceptions, intermarriage contributes inevitably to the breakdown and disintegration of Judaism.

In Embracing the Covenant about 50 converts to Judaism, in brief essays, explain why they chose Judaism. Some were in search of new spiritual and intellectual approaches to faith; some found in Judaism the capacity to transform mundane moments into manifestations of holiness; some were attracted to Judaism because of its emphasis on family and community life; and some were attracted to a religion that despite four millennia of exile, prejudice and untold suffering, remains secure and indomitable.

This practical book of deeply felt testimonies includes chapters on the process of conversion, questions and answers on how to begin, a list of organizations across North America involved in providing information to potential converts and a list of recommended readings.

Two excerpts from the book: "My beloved parents, if you visit my Jewish home on a Friday, evening, you will see the Shabbat candles burning brightly. I hope you will join us as we recite the berachot, the blessings, which celebrate the kindling of these lights and the drinking of the wine...I won't be eating bacon when I come for breakfast anymore, but please come over for lox and bagles, anytime!"

"The question for me is not 'Why should I be Jewish.' The question is, 'How can I be sincerely humane?' For me, being Jewish is the best way to be a human being," Amen.

Jewish Life

More bright Chanukah lights found on the Internet

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

And now, the continuation of my Top Eight List of reasons to travel the Jewish Highway this Festival of Lights:

Reason No. 5 – The Music

Chanukah has some of the most delightful songs of any Jewish holiday and you'll find most of them on the Jewish Highway. At Virtual Jerusalem [http://www.jer1.co.il/city_services/holidays/chanukah/chansong.htm] you can read the lyrics and listen to Oh Chanukah, Oh Chanukah, I Have a Little Dreidel, Sevivon, Sov Sov Sov and Mi Yemalel. (To hear the music which is in MIDI format, you will need an application such as Quicktime [http://www.quicktime.apple.com/sw/].) And over at Hanukkah – Festival of Lights – Songs [http://www.ort.org/ort/hanukkah/songs.htm], there is even sheet music for Maoz Tzur, Mi Yemalel and Hanukkah.

For something a bit more formal, go to [http://www.613.org/chanuka.html] where you will hear Pinchas Rabinovicz, "the first Cantor of the Internet," sing the Chanukah blessings, Hanerot Halalu, Maoz Tzur and other songs. (You'll need RealAudio [http://www.realaudio.com/] to hear Cantor Rabinovicz.)

Reason No. 6 – The Gelt

The exchange of coins is a tradition of Chanukah, but in From Gelt to Gifts [http://www.ucalgary.ca/~elsegal/Shokel/961121_Geltl.html] Eliezer Siegel looks at the curious frenzy of gift giving that has evolved at this time of the year.

If you are looking for gelt to give away, then you can take a look at the coins and medals issued by the State of Israel [http://www.coins.co.il/]. And if you do decide to exchange other presents at Chanukah, there are some tips on gift giving [gopher://www.shamash.org:70/00/places/boston/bakol/hanukkah/hanugift].

Reason No. 7 – The Oil

Central, of course, to the story of Chanukah is how oil enough for one day miraculously burned for eight days. Olive oil has played a crucial role for the Jewish people as you will see in Striking Oil! The Complete Story of Oil and the Jews. [http://www.jer1.co.il/city_services/holidays/chanukah/strike.htm]. This site goes on to explain the science (and art) of how olives are pressed and how olive oil has played a crucial role in everything from anointing kings to being part of sacrifice rituals to medicines and cosmetics to becoming a symbol of peace.

If you need to know more about olives, there is always the massive Ode to Olives page [http://www.iac.co.jp/%7Edaccordo/olive.html]. With over 50 links to other olive sites (including Israel's Gilboa Beit-Hashita Olives [http://www.gilboa.co.il/olives.htm]), this is clearly the work of somebody who loves his olives.

And Reason No. 8 – The Food

Perhaps the best place to put that oil is on a hot skillet for latkes or inside a deep fryer for sufganiyot.

The Jewish Communication Network's International House of Latkes [http://www.jcn18.com/holiday/hanukkah/recipe.htm] has a traditional latke recipe, as does Virtual Jerusalem [http://www.jer1.co.il/city_services/holidays/chanukah/recipes.htm]. And if you're looking for something really different like North African style sweet potato pancakes or potato pancakes with apples topped with nectarine and sweet basil compote, then you won't want to miss Potato Pancakes with a Twist [http://www.caryn.com/holidayHrecipes.html].

And what would Chanukah be without sufganiyot, those jelly-filled, oil-fried, sugar-sprinkled, waist-enlarging treats. At the Jewish-Food Chanukkah Archives [http://www.eskimo.com/~jeffree/recipes/chaindex.htm], you'll find no fewer than nine recipes for sufganiyot, including incredibly a recipe for No Fry Sufganiyot [http://www.eskimo.com/~jeffree/recipes/sufgan8.htm].

Sufganiyot without oil? Sacrilege!

New Jewish board games for Chanukah holiday

By JORDAN MAX

With Chanukah here, you're probably starting to panic about what gifts to get for the kinder or grandkinder.

Guest Voices

Instead of the usual, batteries-not-included, single-use toys, how about some new family board games specially designed for the Jewish market.

Kiddush Time: Each player moves his little elbow piece around a- board filled with Kiddush goodies. The objective is to land on as many different foods as possible in the shortest amount of time, while still having room left over for Shabbat lunch. Filled with obstacles such as Herring Gone Bad, Lengthy D'var Torah, High Blood Pressure/Cholesterol, as well as the grand prize, Invited to Bar Mitzvah celebration, and the super grand prize, Wedding Sweet Table.

Day School Pursuits: The family budgeting board game. Work together to set and maintain a budget to afford mortgage/rent, child care and/or day school tuition, shul dues, tzedakah, food, clothing, toys and games, summer camp and vacation, and still have left for a phone call or even an occasional dinner out. Obstacles include Child Needs Braces, Bar/Bat Mitzvah celebration. Wild cards include Win the Lottery, Third Income, Government funds Day Schools (really wild card).

Mashgiach!: The game of kashrut skill and knowledge. Each player is given a set of miniature meat and milk pots to move around the kitchen and prepare imaginary recipes. But keep the pots separate! When one player makes a mistake, the first one to yell Mashgiach gets points for describing the problem and how to fix it. Also available soon in Glatt Kosher/Cholov Yisroel Mashgiach (advanced version) and Passover Mashgiach (the super-advanced version).

Assimilation/Continuity: The double-sided, intergenerational, educational game of chance that's on everybody's mind. Based on reverse psychology, players attempt to assimilate the fastest possible. Each player begins as a child, and proceeds through life using Choices cards to move to next consequence. Obstacles include Ba'al T'shuvah' Encounter, Spouse Wants Christmas Tree, Summer Program in Israel. Or, turn the board over and play Continuity, with a similar process. Obstacles include Door-to door Missionaries, concerts/parties on Shabbat, post-Shabbat/Yom Tov electricity bills, Gala Fundraiser events, Day School tuition fees.

Big Macher: Players compete to become the Biggest Macher in town, by getting on as many committees, attending as many Gala events, making as many donations to as many charities as possible, thereby accumulating plaque cards. Obstacles include Revenue Canada Tax Audit, Lose Appointment Book, Partner Embezzles Firm, Competitior Gives Bigger Donation.

Get On The Bus-סרט חובה:

ספייק לי הוא ללא ספק במאי הסרטים השחור החשוב ביותר של תקופתנו. כל הסרטים שלו עוסקים בבעיות של השחורים והוא נוקף, ביקורתי, כואב, ולא מייפה את מה שקורה. כל סרטיו הקודמים-אלה שהצליחו קופתית ואלה שלא - עוררו מחשבה והשאירו את הצופה בלתי אדיש. הסרט האחרון, לטעמי, עולה על כולם. נדמה לי שזהו הסרט החשוב ביותר שראיתי מאז "רשימות שינדלר", ומה שספייק לי עושה לאחיו הכושים מאוד דומה (אם כי בנושא שונה) למה שסטיב שפילברג עשה ליהודים. זהו סיפורה של קבוצת גברים כושיים שיוצאים באוטובוס מלוס אנגלס כדי להשתתף בהפגנת "מליון הגברים הכושיים" שנערכה ביוזמת האנטישמי פארחן, בוושינגטון ב - 1995 . כל אחד מביא איתו לנסיעה את הסיפור שלו, וכמובן - נוצרות אינטראקציות מעניינות בין הנוסעים. יש ביניהם שוטר חצי כושי שאמו לבנה, שאביו השוטר נרצח בילדותו בידי כושים צעירים, וחברו לספסל הוא בחור צעיר שהפך לדתי לאחר שנים שבהם ההובי שלו היה להרוג, גם שוטרים. ויש ביניהם זוג הומוסקסואלים כושיים שזוכים לקיתונות של לעג והתנכרויות מצד נוסעים אחרים, שמרניים בדעותיהם. ויש כמובן גם נהג יהודי (לבן), שבאמצע הדרך מחליט שזה מספיק. כשמפציר בו מארגן המסע (שגם הוא נהג) להישאר, עונה לו היהודי: "איך אתה היית מרגיש בתור שחור אם היית מסיע קבוצת לבנים לכנס של ה 'קו קוקס קלאן' ". מסקנתו העיקרית של ספייק לי היא שאם הגברים הכושים לא יקחו את גורלם בידיהם - כלום לא יקרה לטובה. הם יוכלו להאשים את הלבנים בקיפוח שלהם כמה שירצו - זה לא יעזור להם. וכדי להדגיש את הנקודה - מסתיים הסרט ברשימת המשקיעים שמימנו אותו ומציין שהם כולם גברים שחורים. אין מה להגיד - בתוך אופרות הסבון והשמאלץ שמעניק לנו הקולנוע האמריקני - זהו סרט עם אמירה אמיתית. גם מעניין גם מרתק, עם מוסיקה מדליקה, גם תבכו וגם תצחקו! הסרט מקבל תשע בסולם קורן.

חנה לסלאו היתה בעיר. לא, אל תטעו! לא הלכתי! אבל אביא לכם מונולוג של חבר שהלך:

"פשוט לא יאומן כמה וולגאריות אפשר להוציא בערב אחד. מהתחלה ועד הסוף מתחת לחגורה. אין רמזים, אין ניחושים - הכל במילים ברורות ובשם המפורש. הקהל צחק ואני הייתי עצוב: אם הדבר הזה עם החזה הכמעט חשוף מסמל את מה שקורה בישראל - כמה עצוב."

עד כאן החבר. Well, לא נעים להגיד, אבל זה כן מסמל את מה שקורה שם. הינה עוד דוגמא: כשהיינו שם הקיץ הוזמנו לחתונה של ילדי חברים. מיד אחרי החופה, עוד הרב והחזן וזקני המשפחה עושים את דרכם לשולחנות - במקום מרש החתונה פצחו הצעירים בריקוד סוער לצלילי להיט עכשווי של זמר תורן. השורה העיקרית בפזמון החוזר מציינת איבר אינטימי בשם הסלנג שלו, ודימויו למדינה.(חשבתי לצטט לכם את השורה, אבל אני יודע שהעורך היה מוחק אותה). קפאנו על מקומנו: "את שומעת מה שאני שומע?" שאלתי את בת שבע... מה להגיד - פומפיאה בנפילתה. שלא תחשבו שהפכתי למגלגל עיניים, מתחסד או יפה נפש, אבל יש משהו מאוד עצוב כשאנשים מגיעים לדרגה כזו של התבהמות. לעיתים, המרחק מתופעה שאנו מכירים, מאפשר אולי לשמרנו מלגלוש לתוכה.

משהו טוב לסוף:

טרשת נפוצה (Multiple Sclerosis), היא מחלה קשה וקטלנית שאין לה טיפול ידוע. לפני כחודשיים פורסם שחברת "טבע" קיבלה את אישור רשות התרופות האמריקנית לשווק תרופה חדשה לטרשת נפוצה. התרופה פותחה מאלף עד תו בישראל בהשקעה של עשרות מליוני דולאר. זוהי התרופה הישראלית הראשונה שמצליחה להיכנס לשוק האמריקני, ומצפים שהיא תכניס למשקיעים, וכן לכלכלה הישראלית מאות מליוני דולארים. מעודד, משמח, ממלא גאווה.

Recht takes over as president of CTS

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Litigation lawyer Arnold Recht hasn't hung his law degree on the wall of his downtown office, but he does have the honorary fellowship he received two years ago for his contributions to Technion-Israel Institute of Technology.

Recht, 48, who succeeded Jack Chisvin as national president of the Canadian Technion Society (CTS) this fall, is an enthusiastic spokesperson for the Haifa institution. The 16-inch-high stack of legal files awaiting his signature can hold; there are things he wants to say about Technion.

The school, which has been likened to the Massachusetts Institute of Technology (MIT), has 11,000 students and will have to accommodate an additional 5,000 within the next five years, Recht said. The Technion conducts research for foreign governments and international corporations, produces 75 percent of Israeli engineers and is "one of the few institutions that functions on a balanced budget" ($81 million US) with no accumulated deficit.

Arnie Recht

One of the first institutions to research the use of CAT scans, the Technion counts among its recent achievements the development of a metal stent to open clogged cardiac arteries with minimal invasiveness. It is now being used in the United States, Recht said.

Although he has no background in science or technology, Recht has been excited about the Technion since his first visit there in 1971. An only child of Holocaust survivors, he vowed then that one day he would become involved with the institution.

His involvement began 14 years ago, following the cancer-related death of his colleague Ian Samis. Because the young lawyer who worked for his firm had shared Recht's enthusiasm about Israel's high technology advances, Recht and his law partner Allan Freedman established a memorial scholarship in Samis' name at the Technion.

An invitation from CTS followed soon after and Recht was happy to become involved. He was 34 at the time, but the average age of CTS leaders was about three decades older.

Since then, there has been a dramatic increase in CTS involvement among Recht's contemporaries. Richard Cooper, the Toronto chapter president, is 44, Recht noted.

The leadership of the organization has deliberately eschewed a separate program for young leaders, Recht explained. "We decided it was important [to work together]."

His priorities as president include fostering organizational cohesiveness on a national basis (the CTS has offices in Vancouver, Toronto and Montreal and a presence in other cities including Calgary, Edmonton, Winnipeg, Ottawa and Halifax) and increasing awareness of the Technion among both Jews and non-Jews.

The organization's number 1 project now is to complete the Technion's molecular medicine research centre headed by former Torontonian Dr. Karl Skorecki.

The Canadian Centre for Health, Technology and Economics, which opened last year to focus on kidney research, will be renamed in 1997 in honor of Art Eggleton, Canada's minister of international trade, who will be honored by the CTS at a fundraising dinner in May.

"I want to get the Skorecki project completed," said Recht. "We have no doubt it will be expanded."

Recht believes that the Technion, because of its cutting-edge projects, is an important component in a strong Israel.

"When the Technion opened its doors in 1924, it started producing the people necessary to turn the barren land into an agricultural landscape and [has produced more recently] some of the most unbelievable hi-tech products."

Goldberg dedicated her life to helping others

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Tillie Goldberg, a woman who dedicated her life to volunteerism, died recently at the Baycrest Hospital at age 86.

She served with distinction as president of the Women's Auxiliary of the Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care, founder-president of the Toronto Leukemia Research Fund, president of the Weizmann chapter of Hadassah-WIZO and bazaar chair of the Hadassah Bazaar.

She was also active in the State of Israel Bond campaigns, Youth Aliyah, United Jewish Appeal, Mount Sinai Hospital and the United Way. In 1980, she received the State of Israel Peace Award.

Born and raised in Toronto, she was the oldest of 10 children. Since she had to help the family financially, she did not attend high school, but continued to learn and study on her own.

In 1941, she married Wolfe Goldberg, a successful textile merchant who predeceased her.

Friends speak of her kindness and generosity and describe her as a proud Jew and Zionist, who had a strong sense of right and wrong and spoke out against injustice.

In her eulogy, her granddaughter Shalyn spoke of her grandmother as a woman who "answered the call of the family and of others. Her love, compassion and caring embraced all — young and old, friend and stranger."

Goldberg is survived by her sons, Melvin and his wife Marilyn, and Gerald and his wife Marion, and four grandchildren.

Novak prepares to take over Jewish studies program

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — David Novak is always amazed at the number of Jews who are shocked to learn about non-Jewish students enrolled in Jewish studies classes.

"Obviously if it doesn't have Jewish students, something is wrong, but this is a university, not a yeshivah," says the recently appointed chair of the University of Toronto's Jewish studies program.

"A Jewish studies program would be a failure if only Jews studied," said Novak, an ordained rabbi, in an interview. It's not just a service for some Jewish students. It really has intellectual and cultural significance."

The creation of the endowed chair – due in large part to a leadership gift from Dick and Dorothy Shiff – is "one of the early steps in a significant surge that will make us one of the leading centres for Jewish studies on the continent," said Donald Dewees, vice-dean of Arts and Science.

Other initiatives in the program, now in its 26th year, include the establishment of the Zacks Chair in Jewish History, the Shoshana Shier Distinguished Visiting Professorship and current fundraising initiatives for a chair in medieval Jewish studies.

Novak, 55, has been the Edgar M. Bronfman professor of Modern Judaic Studies at the University of Virginia since 1989. He will officially assume the chair at U of T on Jan. 1 and will be a professor of both religion and philosophy.

His goals include "moving the Jewish studies program in a direction where it is much more philosophically oriented and more oriented towards questions of normative ethics, in connection with biomedical ethics, law and theological [issues]. These are areas where the Jewish studies program has very important contributions to make."

Before making the switch to full-time academia, Novak, a fifth-generation American and founder of the Union for Traditional Judaism, served as a pulpit rabbi in Oklahoma City (Emanuel Synagogue, 1969-72), Baltimore (Beth Tfiloh Congregation, 1972-77), Norfolk, Virginia (Congregation Beth El, 1977-81) and Far Rockaway, New York (Congregation Darchay Noam, 1981-89).

The author of nine books, Novak has expertise in Jewish ethics and modern Jewish thought. He has taught at Oklahoma City University, Baltimore Hebrew College, Old Dominion University in Norfolk, the Jewish Theological Seminary and Baruch College of the City University of New York.

Although he chose to focus on an academic career, he enjoyed the pulpit, he said, and still officiates on occasion. As an academic, he feels his pulpit experience gave him "something many academics don't have — contact with the real world. I've dealt with people in real-life crisis situations, not just reading about it."

He likes to make himself available to students, he noted. "That's part of my rabbinic background. I like personal contact. I enjoy students."

Next month, Novak will begin teaching an undergraduate course in Jewish ethics. He will also teach a graduate seminar in Judaism and Kantian philosophy.

Schwartz gets back to her roots

Spotlight

Hannah Schwartz

An occasional series

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Special to the CJN

TORONTO – Hannah Schwartz, secretary at the Holocaust Education and Memorial Centre returned to her roots when she took the job in 1989.

Born to Holocaust survivors in Romania after the war, Schwartz grew up in Montreal with a lot of unanswered questions.

"My father was in a forced labor camp and my mother was in hiding during the war. They talked a little, but for the most part they tried to get on with their lives and forget. Working here, I have become a lot more aware," she says.

As the secretary to the centre's director, Pnina Zilberman, a major part of Schwartz's job is coordinating school bookings and arranging for the students to speak to survivors.

"We have a roster of survivors who are willing to come to the centre and speak about their experiences. They know the importance of keeping everything on the surface. Their testimonies leave a big impact on the students and a majority come out with a greater empathy. Some have even written them notes of admiration."

In an attempt to make the Holocaust "mainstream," Schwartz has tried to target non-Jewish schools outside the local area, "because they are not as aware as the students in Toronto. Students come through, see the artifacts and memorabilia and talk to survivors. They need to be educated about the atrocities. Since Schindler's List was released, people have become more aware of the Holocaust. They want to visit us and see actual footage. Many people need to know that it actually happened."

Schwartz says her job is more than a job, but rather a way of life.

"I like to see the children learn and I enjoy speaking to the survivors who feel very comfortable here. I have actually become very close to many of them. I am trying the reinforce the meaning of the Holocaust to my own two sons who are 18 and 14 years old. I want a link forged between them and their grandparents. They carry a very special legacy and I want them to be aware of their roots.

"I interact with lay people on the centre's various committees including generation to generation, youth for youth, education and Yom Hashoah, and they know that the public needs to be aware. These people do a lot of education and outreach and want people to understand that we are not just a museum, but a learning centre as well, where people of all ages can come and do research."

Bernard brings unity message to AJC conference

By JOEL JACOBSON
CJN Atlantic Correspondent

HALIFAX — Max Bernard has been on a mission for the past five years. His work will continue until Canadians convince the people of Quebec that remaining in a united Canada is the only way to go.

Bernard, a Montreal lawyer who chairs the Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) national unity committee, appeared here recently on a Canadian unity panel at the 10th biennial conference of the Atlantic Jewish Council.

"The more work we do now, the greater the chance another referendum will never happen," he said in an interview. "By making this a priority item, we'll dispel the threat hanging over our collective heads in Canada."

Bernard told 100 delegates that Atlantic Canadians have always been welcoming and have responded positively to the notion that Canada is worth saving, particularly a Canada with Quebec.

"But we must get the message out to dispel the myths. There is misinformation and we have to get the true story to Quebecers. The people of Canada must motivate the politicians and give momentum to the process that will create conditions in Canada to resolve the problem once and for all."

He said about one-third of Quebecers are committed separatists, about one-third want to stay and the others have to be convinced.

"The latter group wants recognition of their place in Canada. If we give them the opportunity to express themselves, they will, and they'll sort out for themselves what they require. We in Canada are certainly understanding of their specificity as a culture and minority language," he said.

For the past six years, CJC has been part of a coalition with the Hellenic Canadian Congress and National Congress of Italian Canadians, which started as a Quebec initiative, but became national. Five years ago, the coalition, with Bernard spearheading CJC's participation, began visiting every province to spread the word.

Bernard said the coalition has become more active again as antagonism has risen because of the 1995 vote, which satisfied no one; because of an increased focus on ethnic groups; because the rest of Canada hoped the problem would be solved by federalists but wasn't; and because, despite the best of goodwill, politicians can't deal with the issue without a sense of where the public lies.

A new document published by the coalition cites the three Rs to national unity — reconciliation, recognition and renewal. Reconciliation means Canadians recognize the unique place the French language and culture has within Canada. Recognition calls for Canadians to recognize that Quebec, while equal to all provinces, is different, mainly because of its language and culture. And renewal suggests renewing the federated partnership based on modern imperatives of sound government management.

Neo-Nazis in Canada

While neo-Nazism in Canada has "valleyed out since reaching a peak in 1993, racist extremism isn't gone. It's dangerous to be lulled into this fairy tale," said Bernie Farber in another session at the conference.

Farber, national director of community relations for CJC, told an audience of 75 regional leaders that hate still exists on the east coast, citing recent neo-Nazi activity in Moncton.

"Eight weeks ago, police raided a so-called house of hate, found neo-Nazi skinheads with a mountain of vile anti-Semitic literature and ran them out of town. Moncton police sent the message — hate groups are not welcome."

Farber reviewed the history of hate groups in Canada, briefly discussing cases involving convicted hatemongers Malcolm Ross, George Burdie and Wolfgang Droege. He cautioned that "new" hate outlets are being formed through hate music on compact discs, telephone hate lines and the Internet.

Six Atlantic Jews get honors at AJC conference

By JOEL JACOBSON
CJN Atlantic Correspondent

HALIFAX — Six Atlantic Canadians were honored for community service at the 10th biennial Atlantic Jewish Council (AJC) conference in Halifax.

More than 150 of their peers offered standing ovations to Dr. Joseph Arditti, Saint John; Naomi Honey, Kentville, N.S.; Harry Levine, Fredericton; Max Lubetzki, Sydney; Dr. Irving Perlin, Halifax; and Philip Riteman, Bedford, N.S.

Honey has planned and hosted meetings in the small, wide-spread Jewish community in the Annappolis Valley of Nova Scotia. Commited to Israel, she has volunteered for Sar-El and offered her gemmological expertise to buyers at the Bourse in Ramat Gan. She has been at-large representative on AJC for her area for four years.

"I want to thank AJC but feel I've gained more from the council than I've given," she told the audience, which included Nova Scotia's governor, James Kinley, Premier John Savage, Halifax MP Mary Clancy and Halifax regional municipality mayor Walter Fitzgerald.

Lubetzki has been involved in the Sydney Jewish community for decades, serving as president of Temple Sons of Israel on several occasions and being active in chevra kadisha. Since he is in a community without a rabbi, he is responsible for all services held at his shul and presides at funerals and unveilings.

Outgoing Atlantic Jewish Council president Larry Freidman, CJC president Goldie Hershon, Nova Scotia Premier John Savage and CJC Quebec Region chairperson Reisa Teitelbaum.

In the greater community, he has been involved in the Nova Scotia Society for Crippled Children and the Glace Bay Rotary Club, has chaired its crippled children fund for 25 years, was named a Paul Harris Fellow of Rotary International and was on the board of governors of University College of Cape Breton.

"I turned 80 in September, celebrated my 52nd wedding anniversary [with wife Anita] in October, and now this award caps a very special year. I share this honor with my congregation and the many devoted people who come to our shul," he said.

Arditti, born and educated in Turkey, collaborated with Keren Hayesod between 1948 and 1954 to help with the migration of 50,000 Jews from Turkey to Israel. In Saint John, he has been president of Shaarei Zedek Synagogue twice and actively attends and participaticipates in Shabbat and holiday services.

A neurosurgeon at Saint John General Hospital, Arditti has been active in B'nai Brith, Jewish United Synagogues, UIA, Canadian Jewish Veterans, and was Saint John chair, United Jewish Appeal.

Levine served two terms as president of Sgoolai Israel Synagogue, one term as president of Fredericton B'nai Brith and has co-chaired UIA campaigns on several occasions. He has been top fundraiser in each of the eight years of the Fredericton Labatt Lite 24-hour relay and is an honorary life president of the YM-YWCA.

Perlin retired in 1984 after 45 years as a gynecologist and obstetrician in Halifax. He has been part-time cantor at Shaar Shalom Congregation since it was formed in 1954, chair of UIA in Halifax and was post-commander of the Jewish War Veterans of Canada in Halifax.

Riteman, a Holocaust survivor, settled in Newfoundland in 1946, selling goods from a pack on his back even though he spoke no English. He now operates a trading company in Halifax.

Since 1988, he has been in constant demand from school and church groups to speak on the Holocaust. Almost singlehandedly carrying the region's load as a survivor, he talks to thousands of Maritimers each year, to preserving the memory of those events.

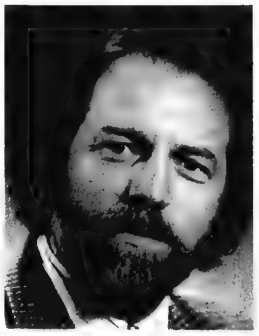
Professor creates data base on the Holocaust

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter



Alain Goldschläger

LONDON, ONTARIO — While filmmaker Steven Spielberg has been collecting video testimony from Holocaust survivors around the world, a professor at the University of Western Ontario has been amassing his own collection of written Holocaust memoirs.

Alain Goldschläger has formed the Holocaust Literature Research Institute, of which he is director, at the university. The institute, which opened officially on Nov. 20, houses over 650 publications – among them fiction, diaries, biographies and autobiographies – and an exhaustive annotated bibliography of close to 2,000 texts.

A comprehensive data base breaks down the collection by country, name of concentration camp, whether the writer is a man or woman, Jewish or non-Jewish, a survivor or not and whether or not the testimony is an eye-witness account.

As a League for Human Rights (B'nai Brith Canada) resource person for the prosecution of Holocaust denier Ernst Zundel during the mid-1980s, Goldschläger, a professor of French, came to realize the importance of survivor testimony. He discovered that many of the accounts had "fallen through the cracks."

"I thought I would find everything in the library and just make a bibliography," Goldschläger said in a recent phone interview. Even at Yad Vashem, published survivor testimonies have not been collected in a systematic way, he said.

For Goldschläger, his quest has been something of a detective story. He looks for testimonies in second-hand and Jewish bookstores, and has contacts in countries like Israel and Belgium to help him search.

Survivor testimony

A native of Belgium whose grandfather died in Theresienstadt, Goldschläger was born in 1946. His parents had survived the war by moving from one address to another in Belgium; his older brother was hidden with a Christian family in the Belgian countryside.

After moving to Canada in 1969, Goldschläger completed his PhD in French at the University of Toronto. At the Free University of Brussels – ("free" as in "free thinker," he points out) – he took about a dozen courses in history while working on his first two degrees.

Most of the books Goldschläger has collected are in English or French, but he also has some in Hungarian, Polish, German, Hebrew, Yiddish and Spanish.

For the past four years he has been trying to locate three books published in Yiddish in 1946 by a small publishing house in Buenos Aires.

Many of the books at the institute were published in small runs intended for family and friends. Some of them were never even typeset, but are copies of typewritten text.

One item to which Goldschläger has a special attachment was published by the Auschwitz Foundation of Belgium. Included in its list of the 60,000 people taken from Belgium to the concentration camps are the names of friends of his parents. Goldschläger's middle name, Joseph, is in memory of one of them. "That's the most emotional for me."

The collection also includes a book published by the Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care last year. "Another special one," said Goldschläger.

Some of the graduate students and faculty at Western have already used Goldschläger's collection for academic research. Next year Goldschläger will give a graduate level course in Testimonial Literature (in English) through the university's program in Comparative Literature.

"In 20 years no first-hand accounts will be published any more. This is a finite collection, and that's frightening," he said.

Goldschläger, who is also national director of the Canada Israel Foundation for Academic Exchanges, estimates there may be another 2,000 to 3,000 books he hasn't yet found. He hopes that as the institute becomes known, people will come forward with appropriate material.

To contact him, call or fax 519-661-3820, write to him at the Holocaust Literature Research Institute, Department of French, University of Western Ontario, London, Ontario N6A 2K7 or e-mail [agold@bosshog.arts.uwo.ca].

Tzedakah project lets youth help Kosher Food Bank

BY WENDY SCHNEIDER
CJN Correspondent

HAMILTON — How do you sensitize people to the needs of the less fortunate? How do you involve young people in community work? How can tzedakah become as natural as picking up a phone?

A group of Hamilton teenagers has found the answer to all these questions through a "tzedakah centerpiece project," which is enriching the lives of organizers, donors and recipients.

The centrepieces are attractive baskets filled with items for the community Kosher Food Bank, and are created, marketed and promoted by the teens. The partially tax receiptable baskets can be decorated according to any theme, and each includes a card bearing the name of the person in whose honor it has been donated.

To date, the centerpieces have appeared at two community events, including a Federation/State of Israel Bonds dinner which raised funds for local Jewish education and a State of Israel Bonds/B'nai Brith breakfast.

The JCC-sponsored project is proving to be a win/win situation for all parties. The Kosher Food Bank, which feeds a number of local families, may be the most obvious beneficiary. But the teens have also provided an opportunity for anyone planning a simchah to make their event more meaningful by giving to the less fortunate.

Most significantly, the teens themselves are reaping the benefits of their own enthusiasm and creativity.

"It's a great chance to get involved in something worthwhile," said group spokesperson Naomi Loewith, 17, "and it's a good way for teens from different youth groups and synagogues to get to know each other."

The JCC has made the core group of six teens responsible for the money raised, most of which is used to buy food for the baskets, with a small portion set aside for a special fund that will enable planning of future events.

In addition to learning basic money management skills, the group is responsible for marketing the idea among their peers and the community at large. To date, up to 20 young people have come out, not only to shop for the food and prepare the baskets, but to help serve the meals at community functions.

Reunion set for Talmud Torah kindergarten class

By DAVID LAZARUS
CJN Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — In recent times, class reunions seem to have taken on a new cachet.

But a reunion planned for the summer or fall of next year is surely a first:

There's a national — make that continent-wide — search on to round up alumni for what will be Canada's first reunion of students from Montreal United Talmud Torahs' (UTT) kindergarten class of '42.

Spearheading the initiative are three Montreal 60-year-old kindergarten bochers who apparently remember what it was like to be 5-year-old tots.

"Things have started to mushroom," said Syd Stein, a textile consultant and one of the trio.

The other two are accountant Barry Silverman and Leonard Sculnick, the former head of Sculnick Transport who now works in the paper recycling business.

Although the idea to stage a kindergarten reunion had been bandied about for several years, said Silverman and Sculnick, who have remained lifelong close pals, plans to go ahead with it took off only about two months ago. A committee of former kindergarteners has been formed to track down the 59 people whose innocent and angelic faces are in the accompanying photo and to put the whole thing together.

It will be a task, they recognize, that will pose a unique set of challenges compared to conventional class reunions.

Most of the girls, naturally, will have married names, not the same surnames as at age 5. Most have not been in any real contact in a half-century. A few may have died. Memories of whom you went to school with in kindergarten are not necessarily as vivid as at older ages.

As well, school was different in those years, said Silverman, who lived only a half-block away from where UTT was located at that time, at 269 St. Joseph Blvd. W., near Jeanne-Mance. Kids in kindergarten together often moved away the next year. Those who remained classmates would not necessarily be together until graduation.

Still, Sculnick said he, Silverman, Stein and a few other kindergarten classmates have been able to successfully identify a little over half of the faces in the photo. Some have been tracked down to places including Toronto, Atlanta and Israel. At writing, 10 or so from the class actually knew about the reunion.

Another encouraging sign is that many from the original kindergarten class of '42 may still be in Montreal, Silverman suggested, because they're from an age group that has not sped down the 401 like many of the younger generation of Quebec Jews.

By sheer coincidence, the reunion will take place during UTT's 100th anniversary year.

Anyone who recognizes him or herself in this photo can reach Silverman at 514-485-3241 or 731-7987; Sculnick at 514-481-7225; and Stein at 514-342-0217.

UVic students complete course on the Holocaust

By MAURICE LUCOW
CJN Western Correspondent

VICTORIA — More than 30 second- and third-year students have just completed an interdisciplinary 12-week credit course on the Holocaust at the University of Victoria (UVic) believed to be the only one of its type in an North American educational institution of higher learning.

The project, called Literature and Lessons of the Holocaust, was created by Prof. Doug Beardsley, and offered through the Department of English. Beardsley was one of the instructors, along with Prof. Phyllis Senese of the Department of History and Peter Gary, a Buchenwald survivor who heads the Vancouver Island Holocaust and Remembrance Society. Neither Beardsley nor Senese is Jewish.

Each professor taught one-third of the course, for which 60 students had applied. Beardsley, who included a number of Holocaust poems in his recent anthology, Wrestling with Angels, opened with a study of Holocaust literature. Senese, who has specialized in researching the early immigration of Jews to Canada, provided a historical perspective arising from the literature and Gary gave his personal account as a witness to the Holocaust.

Consultants for the course included Dr. William Nicholls, professor emeritus of the Department of Religious Studies at the University of British Columbia; Syrt Walters, a righteous gentile who hid a Jewish family in his home in Holland; and Ken McVay, who combats hate literature on the Internet.

Gary told The CJN it is expected the course will be repeated next year.

Shalom Village to expand

By MOURA WOLPERT
CJN Correspondent

HAMILTON — Shalom Village will go it alone on a $1.2-million addition to its seniors' residence.

Construction has, in fact, already started on the 11-apartment unit, although the fundraising campaign is not scheduled to begin until spring.

Shalom Village applied to the Ontario Ministry of Housing five years ago, but virtually all funding for non-profit housing had been stopped, former Shalom Village executive director Sheila Burman said.

Burman, who retired last June after being associated with Shalom Village since it was in the planning stages over 20 years ago, will head the campaign. She was succeeded by former Shalom Village nursing home director of nursing Pat Morden.

After the application was turned down, "we realized we could not wait," Burman said recently in her office at Shalom Village, where she is preparing the campaign.

Shalom Village has 40 apartments while the waiting list has 60 names and is "growing by leaps and bounds," she explained, "So we took the bull by the horns and decided to build on our own."

Instead of the originally planned 12 apartments, however, only 11 can be built due to lack of space.

"But that's not so bad," Burman said. "We don't want to make Shalom Village too big, anyway. We want it to be comfortable.

Shalom Village also finally got its "supportive housing designation, which means," she explained, "we can employ our own staff and also hire our own care workers." That, in turn, means "we can be more flexible, which makes more sense."

Shalom Village, she added, is the only seniors' residence in Hamilton with a "supportive housing" designation.

Burman is optimistic about reaching the campaign goal, the amount needed to enable Shalom Village to subsidize residents who are unable to pay.

She will be working with co-chairs Arthur Weisz and Irving Zucker, who headed the campaign for the adjacent nursing home.

Anti-black racism rooted in slavery

By MOURA WOLPERT
CJN Correspondent

HAMILTON — The black experience with racism is rooted in slavery and in the European concept of the slave as biologically and intellectually inferior, Jamaican-born Dr. Anthony MacFarlane said in a recent talk here on Racism, the Black Point of View.

The conference on Multiculturalism: the Canadian Dilemma was held at Temple Anshe Sholom, where MacFarlane, who is part African, part white and part Spanish-Portuguese-Jewish, is first vice-president.

A family physician and certified mohel, MacFarlane left Jamaica at the age of 21, and studied medicine at the University of Toronto and later at McMaster, where he first encountered racism.

Until the abolition of slavery, it was illegal for slaves to learn to read and write, "and it is only through education and educating our children that we can overcome the perception of being biologically inferior. I myself," he said, "give the lie to that perception."

Similarly, he said later, lack of education is at the root of black anti-Semitism.

"The difficulty with people who are undereducated and underfed," he said, "is that when someone... comes along, gives them food and reads a little from the Koran, they will jump on the bandwagon because they think he will improve their lot."

To combat this, he suggested Jews "should think what they can do to help North American blacks.

Through his association with the Jewish community and Anshe Sholom congregation, MacFarlane said he has, "in a sense, grown up" and met people who not only "have a very sophisticated conception of racism" but also "the savvy to know how to behave towards people who don't like you."

MacFarlane was introduced by Rabbi Irwin Zeplowitz of Temple Anshe Sholom, Other speakers were Hamilton-Wentworth Regional Police official Jane Mulkewich; Prof. Jim Walker of Waterloo University: and Hamilton Spectator reporters Casey Kornstanje and Andrew Dreschel, who were honored for their investigative reporting on the presence in Canada of a Romanian fascist network.

Participants included Anshe Sholom president Jay State; former JCC president Larry Szpirglas; and Rabbi Bernard Baskin, rabbi emeritus of Anshe Sholom.

The conference was sponsored by the Jewish Community Centre, the Herb and CeCe Schreiber Foundation and Frank Junger. Chair was Dr. Ronnie Miller, Anshe Sholom's director of education.

Luxury Homes Rise On The Site Of The Primrose Club In Forest Hill

The Russell Hill Townhomes In Forest Hill

December 1996 - When the Barclay-Grayson Development Corporation launched their Rosedale townhome development just a year ago, most people in the industry told them there was no market for luxury townhomes in the $500,000 to $750,000 range. Eighteen townhome sales and several prestigious awards later, One Avoca is considered one of the industry's biggest success stories in recent years. It was so successful that Barclay-Grayson is in the process of launching another upscale neo-classical style townhome development, this time in the heart of Forest Hill.

The Russell Hill will be located on the site of the old Primrose Club at the corner of Russell Hill Road and St. Clair Avenue West, and bordering Winston Churchill Park. Part of Toronto's famed Forest Hill community, the 25 townhomes at Russell Hill have been carefully designed to reflect the well established elegance of the stately neighbourhood.

"There is really nothing else like this on the market," explains Graham Baker, president of The Barclay-Grayson Development Corporation. "Building on what we learned at One Avoca, The Russell Hill will set the new standard for unparalleled elegance and luxury in townhouse living."

The Russell Hill is designed by Burka Architects, who are well known for their work on some of Toronto's finest condominium and townhome residences including 7 Rosehill, Governors Hill and One Avoca. The interiors have been designed by Brian Gluckstein one of Metro's most sought-after interior designers and decorators. Gluckstein's past projects include such prestigious projects as The Cheddington, The Windsor Arms and Palace Place.

The exterior of these homes are neo-classical: inspired, with soaring windows, and limestone front elevations, they would fit in well in London, Rome or Paris. All the parking is underground, which allows for an elegant and unobstructed streetscape. Residents will have two underground parking spaces and their own private entrance from the garage to their home.

These three-storey (plus lower level) townhomes all offer about 3,300 square feet of living area and include private elevators sweeping circular staircases and soaring ten-foot ceilings on the main floor. There is a wide range of unique floorplans available, and each includes at least three bedrooms.

Typical designs include gracious living rooms, formal dining rooms and dens or breakfast areas annexed to elegant kitchens. Features such as granite countertops, custom cabinetry and slate, granite or ceramic tile flooring and appliances such as SubZero give these kitchens an air of relaxed sophistication.

Upstairs, there are sumptuous master bedrooms suites with spacious walk-in closets and marble washrooms and double sinks. A curved stairway beneath a skylight leads to the bedrooms and bathrooms on the third floor. On the lower level each townhome has an entertainment room, laundry facilities, storage area and exit leading to the two underground parking spaces. The townhomes have their own private landscaped garden and gas hook -up for a barbecue.

One of the features that makes the Russell Hill unique is the unparalleled level of standard features found in all townhomes. These include granite or slate flooring in the vestibule and powder room, marble in the lavish ensuites, oak hardwood flooring in the living and dining rooms; fireplaces skylights, cornices and French doors abound, and all of these homes have ten foot ceilings on the main floor.

A few Choice Townhomes Still Available In Toronto's Hottest Property.

Pat Baker, of Baker Real Estate, the company responsible for the sales and marketing at The Russell Hill, says there has already been enormous interest in this project. "However, we still have a few choice townhomes left. The Russell Hill offers buyers a very unique opportunity," says Pat Baker. "It combines all the elegance that defines Forest Hill with the convenience of townhome living. This is also one of the only opportunities to buy a new home complete with an elevator in this well established area."

Construction is scheduled to commence in the spring, with occupancy less than a year later. Interested parties are requested to phone (416) 920-0808 to arrange a private appointment.

Sharansky opposes bar on Reform, Conservative conversions abroad

By HAIM SHAPIRO
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM – Industry and Trade Minister Natan Sharansky said last Sunday he opposes any change that would disqualify Reform and Conservative conversions to Judaism abroad, but he also opposes legitimizing such conversions in Israel.

Sharansky, who has been chosen by the government to explain its position on the proposed conversion law, said that in fact the government as yet has no position. He added that the government could take a stand which he personally would oppose.

Sharansky said the founders of the state had purposely left unclear a number of issues that could be divisive. This was true, he said, of the Law of Return, which constituted a compromise that recognized Reform and Conservative conversions performed abroad, but did not recognize such conversions in Israel.

By petitioning the High Court, which had given a degree of recognition to non-Orthodox conversions performed in Israel, he said, the Reform and Conservative movements had endangered the status quo. By giving the Chief Rabbinate authority to authorize conversions in Israel, the legislators were adding an official stamp to an existing condition; a step which Sharansky said he regrets, but considers necessary after the High Court ruling.

Sharansky said the proposed legislation — which would also affect conversions performed abroad —had been submitted privately by Agudat Yisrael and Shas and has no chance of passing in the Knesset.

"I am against it and Yisraeli b'Aliyah is against it," he said.

Proposed legislation

However, he added, the government had failed in making this clear to Diaspora Jewry. Of the hundreds of letters he had received, hardly any showed understanding of the situation, he said. It was a mistake, he said, that the ministers had not met with Reform and Conservative rabbis, and this would be corrected. In fact, he added, the first such meeting with Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu is to take place in February.

As for the present situation regarding conversion to Judaism in Israel, Sharansky said he favors a more liberal and less bureaucratic approach, but that such conversions must be accepted by all sections of Israeli society. The attitude of the rabbis should be more positive and more friendly, he said, and Sephardi Chief Rabbi Eliahu Bakshi-Doron, who is in charge of the rabbinical courts, had been receptive to this attitude.

In reaction, Rabbi Einat Ramon, spokesperson for the Conservative Movement in Israel, said that by suggesting there would be no change in the status quo, Sharansky was trying to put one over on Diaspora Jewry.

It is clear, she said, that the religious parties are attempting to end the present situation whereby Israeli citizens can go abroad and convert to Judaism with non-Orthodox rabbis, and Sharansky had not even addressed that issue.

Rabbi Ramon also accused Sharansky of failing to solve the problem of an estimated 150,000 Russian immigrants, who are not Jews according to Halachah.

"He thinks the Orthodox can solve the problem, but they won't," she said, adding that the Orthodox rabbinical courts in effect force people to lie to them.

Rabbi Ramon added that Sharansky has an obligation to all immigrants, not just those from the former Soviet Union, including those from Conservative and Reform communities in the West.

U.S. pushes for Hebron agreement

By DAVID MAKOVSKY and ARIEH O'SULLIVAN
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — U.S. and Palestinian officials met in Gaza last Sunday to decide if a three-page document drafted in Washington could be used to promote a summit between Benjamin Netanyahu and Yasser Arafat.

U.S. consul general Edward Abington held several meetings with Arafat to obtain approval for the document, which is a distillation of Palestinian ideas on Hebron based on private conversations.

The document was drafted by U.S. special Middle East peace coordinator Dennis Ross and Egyptian national security adviser Osama el-Baz in Washington during the last few days, U.S. officials say.

Egypt has been counselling the Palestinian delegation throughout the Hebron talks, and both Arafat and top Palestinian negotiator Saeb Erekat were in Cairo this weekend.

"This is not a document of American ideas, but is based on Palestinian ideas. Once the Palestinians sign off on this, it can then be brought to Prime Minister Netanyahu and there could then be a basis for a summit," a U.S. official said.

U.S. officials believe direct talks between Erekat and Netanyahu advisor Yitzhak Molcho have run their course, and now the top leaders must make decisions.

There were reports that the Palestinians no longer are insisting upon unrestricted use of rifles by Palestinian Authority (PA) security forces in the parts of Hebron that they control. Israel fears that rifles will be used for sniping at Jewish settlers and prefers the security forces be armed only with guns that have short ranges.

The three-page document also is believed to include Palestinian insistence that Israel free prisoners and set dates for three future pullbacks stipulated in the Oslo 2 accord. Finally, the document calls for a date for the talks on the final disposition of the territories.

Plight of children moves cross-world trekker

"People thought I was crazy. Many friends and family members simply cut off relations with me," recalls 41-year-old Boudreau, who abandoned a successful real estate business in Calgary to pedal 160 kilometres a day on behalf of AIDS victims.

Born in Drummondville, Que., Boudreau moved to Calgary over 20 years ago. It was his daughter Krystal —then aged 10 — who told him that he looked unhappy and tired. That was in 1993. Boudreau took time off from his business, moved to Victoria and became involved in helping people with AIDS.

Since he embarked on his journey, he has been robbed four times at gunpoint, was driven off the road by anti-gay extremists and nearly fainted in the Swiss Alps.

But he has also been made an honorary citizen of Dallas, photographed with Hollywood stars like Patrick Duffy and Suzanne Sommers, and believes he was the first cyclist to ride through Croatia following the war in the Balkans.

He opens his photo album and points to a group shot of beautiful African children in Senegal, dressed in traditional garb. "Can you tell which ones have AIDS?" he asks. The children are smiling, their eyes beaming. "Half of them are HIV-positive."

Next to the photograph is a French-language greeting card with a sketch of a child: "I have AIDS," it says. "Please hold me in your arms. I won't make you ill."

It was the plight of children with AIDS that particularly moved Boudreau and became the theme of his world trek. He recalls going to a restaurant in Victoria with a group of children with AIDS who spoke openly about their condition.

"The waitress wouldn't go near them. I thought to myself: 'Why is it okay to die of cancer, but not of AIDS?' I felt I had to do something about this," says Boudreau, whose own daughter is one of his most ardent supporters.

Boudreau's definition of children has no age limit. "Men of 40 and 50 years old are also someone's children. When they reveal they have AIDS, many of them are abandoned by their parents. They tell me they will never see their families again. They know they are going to die alone."

Boudreau believes that compassion and forgiveness are the key to controlling the spread of the disease.

"As long as the disease is cloaked in shame, we can't speak openly open about it. This stymies educational efforts and discourages testing, ultimately promoting the spread of the virus."

The Canadian — who spoke to university students in Tel Aviv and Jerusalem and appeared on local radio shows during his visit — was struck by the indifference towards AIDS in Israel.

"People live under the illusion that it's not a problem here. But the statistics reveal only a small part of the picture. Because there is no anonymous testing, many HIV-positive people don't bother to test themselves. They may be spreading the virus without realizing it."

Israel is one of the only Western countries that does not have anonymous testing (with the exception of a small clinic run by the Tel Aviv-based Israel AIDS Task Force.)

According to World Health Organization guidelines, the number of known HIV carriers should be quadrupled in order to get a more realistic estimate of infected people in countries that don't have anonymous testing. This would raise Israel's total from 1,500 to approximately 6,000.

The cyclist said that in Israel he has had "the toughest time anywhere." Boudreau, who came with a warm letter of introduction and support from Canadian Ambassador David Berger, received generous backing from only one corporate sponsor: SuperPharm, headed by Canadian-born Leon Koffler.

Several international chains, including McDonald's, Budget Rent-a-Car and Pizza Hut, supported his cause all over the world. But the Israeli subsidiaries refused to be associated with him, he says.

"There is obviously fear of being linked to the AIDS struggle. But this is a pity."

SOLDIER KILLED IN SOUTH LEBANON

JERUSALEM — One Israeli soldier was killed and another wounded when a roadside bomb exploded last Saturday in south Lebanon.

Mohammed Hujirat, 27, a Bedouin tracker from the Galilee, was killed while leading a patrol in the eastern sector of the southern Lebanon security zone. Another tracker who was with him suffered light to moderate shrapnel injuries.

An initial inquiry by the Israel Defence Force found that the bombs had been set a day or two before by members of Hezbollah and that the charges were detonated by remote control. Several other explosives found in the area did not go off. The Hezbollah members were suspected to have come from the nearby village of Tivnit.

In retaliation, Israeli forces shelled the area. Lebanese authorities claimed that seven civilians were injured by the shelling.

Lebanon filed a complaint against Israel with the United Nations. In response to the complaint, a senior Israeli source said that Hezbollah, not Israel, was responsible for the injuries. (JPFS)

Israelis and Syrians engage in sabre-rattling

By SHELDON KIRSHNER

For the past few months, Israel and Syria have been accusing each other of preparing for war.

Mideast Analysis

The sabre-rattling has unfolded against the backdrop of Syrian troop movements in Lebanon, mixed signals from Syria regarding its intentions and somewhat conflicting Israeli statements about what it all means.

The shrill war of words has brought Israel's invariably prickly relations with Syria to a nadir.

Not since the early 1980s, when the two sides faced off in a missile crisis and a war in Lebanon, has there been as much tension between the two sides.

Of late, the spectre of an armed confrontation has eased. "There are clear signs of calm on the Syrian front," Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu said last week. But Israel's impasse with Syria over the Golan Heights may produce yet another flashpoint in the future.

This extraordinarily sensitive period in Israel's relationship with Syria was ushered in by Shimon Peres and exacerbated by Netanyahu.

In the aftermath of the four suicide bombings perpetrated by Palestinian terrorists in Israel last February and March, Peres – the then prime minister – suspended peace talks with Syria.

Peres was angry that President Hafez al-Assad of Syria had neither condemned the bloody spate of terrorism, nor bothered to send condolences to the Israeli government.

And Peres knew that the business-as-usual attitude toward Syria could not be sustained, given the presence of Hamas and Islamic Jihad offices in Damascus and Syria's support of Hezbollah operations in southern Lebanon against Israel.

These were sufficiently compelling reasons for Israel to reassess its strategy toward Syria, whose leaders have always considered Israel's existence as a historical injustice.

But the turning point in Israel's deteriorating ties with Syria came during last spring's general election campaign in Israel,when Netanyahu likened Syria to a terrorist state and urged the United States to impose sanctions on Assad's Ba'athist regime.

Netanyahu later distanced himself from this view, but the damage was done. Netanyahu further alienated the Syrians by suggesting that, if necessary, he would order air raids against Hezbollah bases in Syrian-controlled territory in Lebanon. He also incensed Syria by ruling out the possibility of an Israeli withdrawal from the Golan in exchange for a peace treaty. And Netanyahu's Lebanon First proposal, his first diplomatic initiative as premier, was contemptuously dismissed by Damascus as a thinly-veiled ploy to bypass the Golan issue.

In response to an upsurge of violence in Israel's self-declared security zone in southern Lebanon, Netanyahu warned of a possible escalation of hostilities on the Israeli-Lebanese border. The Syrian press, in turn, accused Israel of "beating the drums of war."

Syria's decision to deploy two commando regiments and an armored division to the northern slopes of Mt. Hermon triggered an Israeli alert and anxieties that Syria might launch a limited strike on the Golan.

Netanyahu described the deployments as a blatant attempt by Syria to pressure Israel into committing itself to returning the Golan. But Gen. Amos Gilad, head of the research department at military intelligence, put a different spin on it. He warned that Syria might start a war if it concluded that it could not regain the Golan through diplomatic means.

Since then, Syria has minimized the significance of the troop movements and let it be known that it is not planning a war. Senior officials in Damascus, however, have been quoted as saying that if the peace process collapses, Syria will be forced to consider the military option.

In response to this rhetoric, Netanyahu has said that Israel is watching the situation carefully, and may even increase defence spending. Defence Minister Yitzhak Mordechai has declared that Israel can deter any attack and inflict "serious damage" on Syria.

The foreign minister, David Levy, has not only played down rumors of war, but declared that tranquility in the region is contingent on an Israeli peace agreement with Syria.

Netanyahu has called on Syria to resume negotiations " without preconditions," but Assad insists that any such talks must begin from the point at which they broke off and on the basis of the land-for-peace formula, as enshrined in United Nations Resolution 242.

Furthermore, the Syrians want Israel to respect an apparent oral undertaking by the late Yitzhak Rabin to pull back to the June 4, 1967 lines.

It is doubtful whether Israel and Syria can reconcile their differences. Nevertheless, the Syrian foreign minister has hinted that negotiations may resume in the new year. Meanwhile, Syria's ambassador in Washington has rejected an overture from his Israeli counterpart for a meeting. Peace remains a distant hope.

IDF reveals undercover Egoz unit in Lebanon

By ARIEH O'SULLIVAN
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — The IDF has revealed the existence of a special forces unit, code-named Egoz, which has been operating against Hezbollah guerrillas in south Lebanon for over a year. The unit sees more combat than any other IDF unit, and has chalked up 16 kills since its first mission 17 months ago.

Foreign reports, mainly from the London-based Observer newspaper, have called Egoz a liquidation unit dedicated to tracking down Hezbollah fighters and officials, a charge soldiers and commanders vehemently denied. "The term liquidation unit is a mistake. This is a regular IDF force, a good unit, and operates only in uniform. It doesn't act against civilians, or with the aim of capturing criminals. It is a military unit which fights terrorists and the Hezbollah organization which operates a guerrilla force," said OC Northern Command Maj.-Gen. Amiram Levine.

Levine said Egoz, Hebrew for walnut, was formed in February 1995 and was operational by July 1995. He said the IDF decided to acknowledge the existence of Egoz since it was already an "open secret" and added that it was important to "show off our successes."

IDF Spokesman Brig.-Gen. Oded Ben-Ami added it was felt the soldiers in the unit deserved credit for their actions, and public knowledge of their achievements would boost morale. It is also a clear answer to those who say the IDF had been adopting a predominantly defensive posture in south Lebanon.

The official revelation of the unit comes following a broadcast by Syrian television earlier this month and rerun on Israel's Channel 2 television in which Hezbollah guerrillas said IDF soldiers were weak fighters.

"The Zionist soldier was weaker and more panic-stricken than is portrayed in the Zionist and Western media," a Hezbollah gunman told the interviewer. "We saw one Israeli soldier crying in an ambush. We saw his shrieking, his panic and confusion."

Egoz fighters and commanders brushed off the report as propaganda. "I wouldn't call it a liquidation unit, but when you encounter two or three terrorists from a range of five metres and kill him, then you have killed him," said the unit commander, identified only as Lt.-Col. E.

Levine said the idea to set up Egoz broke a generation-long IDF tradition not to cultivate units which specialize on just one front against a single enemy.

"Our weakness was that we didn't get specific training and expertise on fighting Hezbollah terrorists. The situation in Lebanon demands this so it was important that this specialized unit be set up to deal with this unique front," Levine said.

He said the unit, led by a lieutenant-colonel, was set up in record time of just five months. Its first fighters were taken from other elite units, but now they are directly chosen from Golani recruits.

We have had very nice achievements," Levine said at a briefing for military reporters at a training base in northern Israel. On their very first mission, the unit wiped out a Hezbollah squad, killing two gunmen. It has 16 verified kills, but has lost two of its own members, while others have been wounded.

Lt.-Col. E, said his unit was able to deploy quicker than other combat units because they knew the terrain and were fine-tuned to Hezbollah tactics and moving patterns. Equipped with the latest combat gear, he said, his troops have fought guerrillas, gone deep into Hezbollah territory to lay ambushes, and carried out complicated raids.

The IDF has spared no costs equipping Egoz soldiers with the best equipment available, including laser sights, light weapons and sophisticated radios. It also employs a variety of night vision gear, including thermal cameras that have been used to record firefights.

MKs ink Shabbat compromise

BY LIAT COLLINS
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — As the religious-secular gap seemed to widen even more this week, four MKs from different parties joined together to prepare an agreement on Shabbat closings.

The MKs, led by Alex Lubotsky (Third Way), called for the closure of stores, businesses and shopping malls, but would allow entertainment and recreation centres and cafes to remain open.

Along with Lubotsky, MKs Yuri Stern (Yisrael b'Aliyah), Yona Yahav (Labor) and Ze'ev Boim (Likud) have signed the proposed agreement and more parliamentarians apparently are considering it. Other religious MKs have shown interest, but are reluctant to sign.

"The aim is to create a broad public consensus on the character of Shabbat in the State of Israel," Lubotsky said.

Turkey approves F-4 upgrade accord with Israel

By STEVE RODAN
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — Turkey's Islamist Prime Minister Necmettin Erbakan has signed a $650 million (US) agreement for the modernization of 54 F-4 Phantom fighter-bombers by Israel Aircraft Industries (IAI), the Anatolian news agency reported last week.

Turkish President Suleyman Demirel approved the deal, the president's office said in a statement.

The signature came after what Turkish sources say was extreme pressure from the Turkish military, which was said to have been fed up with Erbakan's delay.

The prime minister said he objected to the high interest Turkey would pay in the financing of the deal, as well as what he claimed was the insufficient amount of work that would be performed by Turkish contractors.

Israeli defence officials expressed satisfaction with the approval and said this would quickly set into motion a long-term contract that would benefit both countries.

IAI executives said they expect the first upgraded Phantom to fly to Turkey as early as mid-January. They said that both sides have agreed on the exact specification of the upgrade and are ready to implement the work.

In the next step in the contract, they said, Israeli banks will submit a downpayment for the work to begin. The company said it does not have any money to carry out the work without outside financing.

Turkish officials were not available to comment on the signing of the latest accord, which was welcomed by the Israeli Embassy in Ankara.

The five-year deal will involve the installation of advanced avionic systems including radar and electronic warfare and navigation systems.

Remote cardiac system made in Israel

By MYRON LOVE
CJN Prairie Correspondent

WINNIPEG — An Israeli-made computer monitoring system for cardiac patients promises to enable people to take their own cardiograms at home as easily as taking blood pressure or measuring glucose levels.

The Heartline system and its technology was developed and manufactured by Aerotel of Israel and the concept was brought to Manitoba by Arie Lavy, an Israeli-born computer consultant who has lived in Winnipeg for over 15 years.

Lavy learned about the system during a visit to Israel two years ago. His consulting company, Lavy & Associates, has clients in the healthcare field, and he saw the potential for Manitoba.

Introducing a new technology to Canada, however, requires a number of steps, Lavy notes. He had to register the device with the federal government and obtain approval from the College of Physicians and Surgeons of Canada. There were also nurses to hire and train.

"We took the most conservative approach to starting a new business," Lavy says. "We did our homework over and over again until we were certain the Heartline system was effective."

Dr. Sheldon Permack, medical director of Lavy's On-Call Remote Monitoring Services, describes the Heartline system as revolutionary.

"This will allow people to take their own cardiograms and transmit them by phone from wherever they are," he says. "They can have instant interpretation and advice regarding their cardiac condition from trained nurses. It is a medical tool that can take a picture of your rhythm and assess the electrical activity of your heart. If you have to go the hospital, then your electrocardiogram (ECG) will be sent to the hospital ahead of you instead of having to wait for the ECG to be done once you get there."

The cardiogram can also be forwarded to a patient's physician for review.

Subscribers to On-Call Remote Monitoring Services are equipped with a portable Heartview personal recorder/transmitter, the size of a telephone pager with easily applied electrodes.

The device transmits the ECG to a central computer system which has a record of each subscriber's medical history. As soon as the client feels any discomfort or chest pain — or at pre-scheduled times — he applies the electrodes to specific areas of the chest and records the ECG signal.

Then he calls On-Call, identifies himself and transmits the data. The new ECG is compared to previous readings.

On-Call nursing staff then advises the patient on how serious the situation looks and what course of action to follow. If needed, On-Call staff will contact an ambulance and inform an emergency department of his impending arrival.

Over the past five months, Lavy and company have been informing cardiologists and other physicians about the concept. Lavy has also assembled a medical advisory board to provide ongoing advice and consultation.

Although the service is only available in Winnipeg for now, Lavy foresees On-Call Remote Monitoring Services gradually extending its reach into rural Manitoba and other parts of the country.

Proud new mother Talia holds her five-day-old triplets at Shaare Zedek Medical Center.

A FAMILY AFFAIR

JERUSALEM – Six sets of twins and three trios of triplets were born in September at Shaare Zedek Medical Center.

Many multiple births result from treatments provided to women who have had difficulty getting pregnant or carrying full term. Talia is one of these women. She gave birth in the 37th week of her pregnancy to two girls and one boy – each baby weighing about three pounds.

Talia is more than a Shaare Zedek patient. Her mother, who still works as a nurse in the hospital's department of geriatrics, gave birth to Talia in the old hospital's building, while Talia is a records clerk in the center, and her uncle is the director of the CT division.

Over 500 births a month are recorded at Shaare Zedek.

Musical Ragtime is a theatrical landmark

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to the CJN

TORONTO — Theatre history was made last Sunday when the musical Ragtime had its world premiere at the Ford Centre for the Performing Arts, igniting the 1,900-person audience into repeated bursts of thunderous applause and cries of Bravo!

Livent's musical treatment of the E.L. Doctorow novel opened with a bang and kept up its enthralling pace for 2½ hours, with one show-stopping number after another.

One came away with the sense that composer Stephen Flaherty and lyricist Lynn Ahrens have crafted a theatrical landmark as durable and uplifting as the Statue of Liberty, and one whose light may shine for generations.

Like the famous statue, Ragtime illuminates the American ideals of equality and brotherhood of all. However, it also casts a light on America's dark underside, showing the tragedy that unfolds after the crew of a Manhattan fire station victimize the successful black pianist Coalhouse Walker Jr. (Brian Stokes Mitchell) as he passes in his Model-T Ford. When Coalhouse chooses to fight for his trampled dignity rather than practise the forbearance advocated by black leader Booker T. Washington (Richard Allen), the fire brigade's spark of racial hatred kindles a shockingly violent conflagration.

The story is set in a turn-of-the-century America that was receiving an unprecedented influx of immigrants, even as it was largely denying social justice to the descendants of liberated black slaves.

Highlighting further injustices, Ragtime depicts the American melting pot as an industrial crucible in which heartless moguls like J.P. Morgan and Henry Ford oppress the laboring class.

"America is the land of opportunity — but only if your name is Mr. J.P. Morgan!" shouts the radical anarchist Emma Goldman (unforgettably portrayed by Camille Saviola) during the number The Night That Goldman Spoke At Union Square, one of my favorite scenes. (I have about eight or nine others.)

Critical to the plot, historical figures like Ford, Goldman, the illusionist Harry Houdini and the sex goddess Evelyn Nesbit sometimes seem to parade across the stage like eerie phantoms, intermingling with Coalhouse and his girlfriend Sarah, and two families caught in the whirlwind of the changing times. The family members are known only by their generic names – Father, Mother, Mother's Younger Brother, Little Boy, and the Jewish immigrant Tateh and his daughter, the Little Girl — as if their personal identities likewise transcend history into myth.

Terence McNally, who wrote the theatrical "book," utilizes an ingenious device in occasionally letting some characters narrate their own stories in the third person. The technique allows for maximum narrative compression while preserving the fabric of the novel to a degree that will satisfy its many readers.

The sets, costumes and lighting seem equally geared to preserving the lyricism and dark gothic romanticism of the novel and, one might almost say, of the period itself. Paradoxically, the stage imagery is sweeping yet economical, and conveys a sense of unceasing movement. We are treated to lush visions of two-dimensional stereoscopic scenes that jump into three-dimensional life, ships passing with lights aglow in New York harbor, the cage-like welcome of immigrants to Ellis Island, the simple grandeur of train stations in New York and New Rochelle, and a pastiche of picture-postcards of Atlantic City, all amidst an almost non-stop cavalcade of shadows, silhouettes and illusions.

Lea Michele as The Little Girl and Peter Friedman as Tateh in the Livent world premiere of Ragtime, now playing in North York.

The exceptional cast is headlined by Brian Stokes Mitchell as Coalhouse Walker Jr. and Audra McDonald as Sarah, who dies in the first act, but returns as a phantasm in Act 2 to sing Sarah Brown Eyes with Coalhouse. Peter Friedman is Tateh, Mark Jacoby is Father, and Marin Mazzie is Mother, whose rousing closing number, Back To Before, is as strong as the character she has become. Steven Sutcliffe is so perfect as Mother's Younger Brother and such a wondrous counterweight to Saviola's brilliant Goldman, that one wants to congratulate not only these outstanding performers but the casting directors as well.

Thanks to Frank Galati who directed and Graciela Daniele who did the musical staging, there isn't a wasted movement or ambiguous gesture anywhere.

Indeed, so many creative forces have fuelled Ragtime's syncopated turbines that one is tempted to list them all, or failing that, simply to congratulate Livent chief Garth Drabinsky for bringing these remarkable talents together.

Artist's oil portraits reach inside the subject

By MIRIAM CHINSKY
Special to The CJN

TORONTO – Paintings and drawings by four generations of his family cover the walls of portrait artist George Hen's home.

Born in 1946 in Holland to Holocaust survivors Alfred and Reina Hen, he points proudly to an oil from the early '30s by his grandfather Elias Hen, a Dutch lithographer who loved to paint. There are paintings as well by his father and sons Geoffrey and Adam.

Hen's own portraits are acutely perceptive. Any adept professional can reproduce a photo on canvas. It takes insight and an affinity for the subject, to reach inside and disclose what is there.

A recent oil, Kindergarten Artists, is charged with such character. On the surface it is a typical classoom scene – a boy and girl in the foreground, each facing a double easel placed between them. In the background a teacher is helping another small child.

But there is total absorption on the boy's face as he works his brush, absolute concentration in the girl's demeanor. Light from a window behind them picks out the teacher bending over the third youngster and her caring is palpable.

Warmth in George Hen's drawings

This is more than just another activity. It is what school, even as early as kindergarten, is all about.

Hen's formal portrait of corporate executive Peter Munk, seated, probes the intensity beneath the outwardly controlled pose. There is the feeling that Munk has barely alit and will plunge into action at any moment.

There is warmth in Hen's drawings of his sons, their faces animated, eyes alive.

Though he always wanted to draw, Hen did not start out as an artist. He was sidetracked, "turned off," he remembers, by a cousin, a successful painter who brusquely defaced something he had brought to show him, hoping for encouragement. "This kid should never be an artist!" the man declared.

He tried for some kind of link, going in right from high school to be an office boy with Gordon Adamson Architects. He became a draftsman and worked within the architectural and construction fields for 25 years.

As an on-site construction administrator, he was involved with such projects as the Lipa Green Building, Market Square at Front and Church, Erin Mills Town Centre and the Hamilton Eaton Centre. He also served as construction manager for the Dutch-style, cable-stayed suspension lift bridge at Harbourfront.

However, building cutbacks forced too many layoffs and he finally opted for a career change. "It just wanted to do something else," he says.

In 1991 at the age of 45, he began to study at the Ontario College of Art, first on a part-time basis, then full-time, graduating with honors in drawing and painting in 1996.

He has exhibited at the Ontario College of Art Open House, the Toronto Outdoor Art Exhibition and a solo exhibition in York City Hall. He has also taught art classes in City of York schools and for the North York Board of Education.

George Hen stands before his oil painting Kindergarten Art.

Israel's credit rating maintained

JERUSALEM — Standard & Poor's has announced that it is maintaining Israel's A-credit rating.

Last week's announcement from the international credit rating firm came prior to Israel's planned offering of approximately $200 million (US) on the Eurobonds market, a move expected to take place any time.

Mini-Review: Yids In The Hall

• Sitting in Yuk Yuk's comedy club recently, audience members could have been forgiven for asking: Why is this night different from all other nights?

The answer: Instead of bitter herbs, salt water and unleavened bread to remind us of Jewish suffering, we had a succession of stand-up comics delivering monologues on Jewish themes as part of the monthly comedy night, Yids In The Hall.

Oh, there were genuine laughs all right, such as when emcee Lou Eisen finally appeared, brandishing a half-smoked cigar in the finest comedic tradition and apologized for the delay: "We figured, since you waited 40 years in the desert, you could wait another 20 minutes."

The evening featured a handful of comics who were very "1990s" in their sensibility: most of their jokes were far too racy to repeat here. Some were also racist, derisive and in such poor taste as to be offensive. Despite all this, some were also funny.

The evening's headliner, Andy Kindler of Los Angeles, initially seemed like he might actually project a touch of class along with his humor. However, he stayed on stage too long; the laughs stopped but he continued.

"Dayenu!" someone shouted, but to no avail. Soon a pronounced exodus was making for the door.

If you like cutting-edge improv-style humor, and don't mind hearing Jewish-themed jokes that some might deem offensive, check out the next Yids In The Hall, Dec. 25, 8:30 p.m. at Yuk Yuk's, 2335 Yonge St. at Eglinton. Admission $10. Dinner also available. 416-967-6425.

Israeli singer Matti Caspi to perform at Toronto's Music Hall

Corey Ross Productions has announced that renowned Israeli musician Matti Caspi will appear Dec. 14, at Toronto's Music Hall (147 Danforth Ave.) at 8 p.m. Accompanied by a band of Brazilian musicians, Matti Caspi will perform in Hebrew and Portuguese from his classic songs and his upcoming album.

Caspi is a singer, composer, producer and arranger. His influence spans the conventional gaps between rock, pop, romantic, classical and world music. In Israel, Caspi has received the Kinor David award (Israel's Grammy) and the ACUM prize (Association of Composers and Lyricists of Israel).

Caspi said his music is very personal. "If I want to make the audience believe in what I do, I have to be myself," he says. Born in Kibbutz Chanita in Northern Israel, Caspi devoloped into a popular artist in the '70s and '80s.

Caspi will be backed by a Brazilian band which has performed with Paul Simon, Cher and Paula Abdul. Tickets are $25 to 38.75 or $87.50 for a VIP ticket which includes a private party with Caspi. TicketMaster, 416-870-8000.

Itzhak Perlman releases new live album

Itzhak Perlman, the internationally acclaimed master of the violin, has caught the Klezmer bug, as he puts it, and through his latest EMI release, is providing a soulful rendition of the music of his roots. Live in the Fiddler's House is a live performance of the music he has now called his own.

Live in the Fiddler's House follows the overwhelming success of Perlman's first klezmer recording, the Emmy Award-winning 1995 album In the Fiddler's House, which has sold over 150,000 in the United States in less than six months.

This new album was recorded live on July 2, at New York's Radio City Music Hall in front of 5,000 people. Perlman appears with four klezmer bands: Brave Old World, The Klezmatics, Klezmer Conservatory Band and the Andy Statman Klezmer Orchestra.

"When you're dealing with music," Perlman said, "you're dealing with the soul of a society; and if there's anything that can be identified as the soul of Jewish society, it's klezmer music."

Both Perlman albums are available at major record stores across the country.

Fly on Shabbat, says ex-El Al head

By STEVE RODAN
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — El Al will disappear in several years, and be replaced by a private carrier, unless the government allows the national airline to fly on Shabbat, the company's former director-general said recently.

Rafi Har-Lev, who left El Al earlier this year after 14 years as director-general, said the company can no longer survive the brutal airline competition while operating only six days a week.

"If El Al doesn't solve this problem, it will disappear from the aviation map," Har-Lev told the Economy '97 conference in Tel Aviv. "This won't happen in a year, but in several years."

Har-Lev said El Al's profits in the late 1980s and early 1990s would have been double or triple what was actually recorded had the carrier been allowed to fly on Shabbat. He said only the sale of the national airline to a private operator would enable the change.

But Har-Lev added the religious parties have conditioned the sale of El Al to a pledge that the buyer would not operate on Shabbat, something that has made privatization virtually impossible.

Har-Lev said he doesn't believe El Al will ever be sold. Instead, he said, it will continue to register losses, and a private Israeli carrier that will operate on Shabbat will soon eclipse the national airline.

This, he said, could take place in as little as two years.

The former director, who said he quit his job when he saw the government back off from its commitment to sell El Al, attributed the company's current woes to the sharp drop in tourism.

Jake's Women:

Tribal Productions does effective job with outdated Simon play

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO – Jake has a problem. His wife is about to leave him and five other women are pleading to give him advice: his daughter, his sister, his analyst, his first deceased wife and his latest girl friend. What should Jake do?

The answer was spelled out, sometimes hilariously, in Neil Simon's Jake's Women, staged by Tribal Productions, a new company headed by graduates of York University's drama program.

"I am studiously nonchalant," said Jake, as his response to all the advice. He is a writer who can't let go of his first wife, who died in a car crash eight years ago.

Samuel Owen

Samuel Owen is effective as Jake, the bewildered writer whose situation the author admits is a mirror of his own life. As Jake's current wife, Kirstin Hinton delivers Simon's one-liners with panache, but lacks confidence at times. However, her understatement could benefit the other women in the cast who tend to go over the top. Lea Garbe, 22, does a better job as the 18-year-old daughter than as her 12-year-old counterpart earlier.

Jake's Women, which refers to family relationships of the '70s, is outdated now. A new company like Tribal should spread its wings more adventurously.

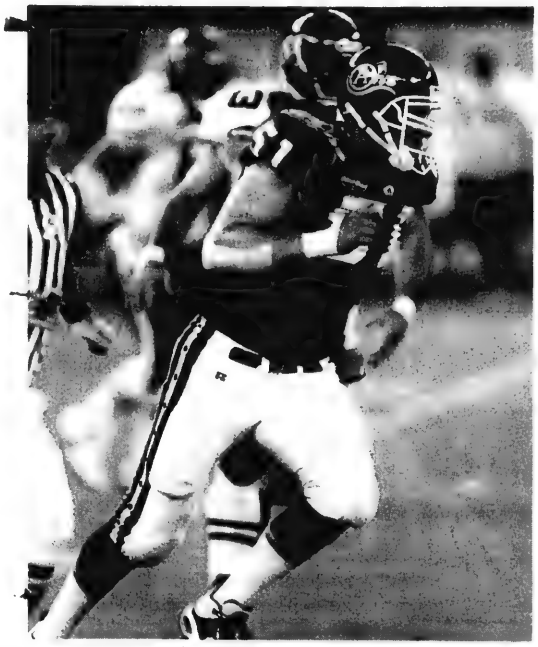
Argos' Cantor on Cloud 9 after Grey Cup win



Defensive lineman Noah Cantor

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — My how things can change in a short period of time.

A little over a year ago, Noah Cantor was a rookie defensive lineman, fresh out of St. Mary's University, happy just to make the lineup of a Toronto Argonauts squad that went on to miss the playoffs.

This year, he and the rest of the Argos have been extolled, paraded, toasted and cheered as league champions, winners of the Grey Cup.

One of a few Argo holdovers who survived an airlift of big-name players, Cantor felt a special elation being on the championship team. A week after the win, he was still on Cloud 9.

"Just to be there and to win — you have to reflect back that I was there and I did it. It was exciting. It's still exciting," he said.

Winning the Grey Cup was a childhood dream come true, Cantor readily conceded. Back when he was a boy, the family would get together to watch the Cup on television and as a teen playing organized football, the Grey Cup was his ultimate goal.

Though not a big name player like defensive linemates Mike O'Shea, Demetrius Maxie or Don Wilson, Cantor was one of the many footsoldiers who made the Argos click throughout a 14-4 season. He played on special teams, in short yardage situations and occasionally he got to spell-off the starters. TV commentators noted that Cantor always played full-tilt and brought loads of enthusiasm to the team.

Full-tilt

That again was his role in the big game in snowy Hamilton. In the Grey Cup, he played in only one short yardage situation, but he also covered punt returns and lined up on field goal attempts.

Despite Edmonton's reputation for stellar defense, Cantor, six foot four, 265 lbs., was confident going into the game. He believed the team's talent level was head and shoulders above the rest of the league and should be able to handle the Eskies.

Even when Edmonton went ahead early with a safety and a TD — and despite the rap against quarterback Doug Flutie that he didn't play well in bad weather — Cantor knew the Argos would bounce back.

"I knew we're a good second half team and we kept it close, we'd be alright," he said.

When the Argos got their first major score, Cantor knew the tide had turned and they'd be tough to beat. In fact, says Cantor, the wind and snow helped keep the score closer than it would have been had the game been played in ideal weather.

Earlier in the season, back when conditions were ideal, Cantor wasn't sure he'd even be on the team at playoff time. With a new head coach, Don Matthews, a new coaching staff and a load of talented, big-name players sucked into Toronto from around the league, his position on the team was precarious.

"Personally, that was scary because you and your friends didn't know if you have a spot on the team," he said.

At training camp, Cantor had to contend with four or five other guys vying for the two or three defensive line spots available and "it was mentally tough."

Fortunately, the 25-year-old lineman impressed the coaches and was kept on, but his best buddy, Jeff Cummins, was traded to Ottawa. The rest of last year's defensive line was released.

One of the regular season's highlights for Cantor was sacking Rough Rider QB Steve Taylor at an away game in his hometown of Ottawa in front of a crowd that included his parents, Bev and Dan Cantor.

Both were with him in Hamilton for the Grey Cup, sitting behind the Toronto bench along with his brother Mark and girlfriend Donna Caplan. An especially sweet moment came when they all joined him in the locker room after the Grey Cup victory, he said.

The Inside Back

Sam Moskowitz (centre) is speaking to a customer in front of his parent's store on Baldwin Street in the early 1970s while his mother looks on and his father arranges the produce.

Lawyer's roots are a real pickle

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Longtime friends of commercial and real estate lawyer Sam Moskowitz refer to him affectionately as "the son of the pickle man."

If you ask him what pickles and law have in common, he will tell you "everything." His fond memories of his parents' store at 186 Baldwin St., filled with barrels of pickles, herring, tomatoes, cabbage and numerous other products, have left him with a love of preparing foods for his family and friends.

And many of his parents' customers have become his clients.

"That store gave me the opportunity to get an education. It was my parents and other immigrant parents who worked tirelessly in order to give my generation a wonderful profession and lifestyle," Moskowitz said in an interview.

His parents, Isaac and Faiga Moskowitz, lived through many horrors in their youth, he said.

Isaac, who was born and raised in Lodz, Poland, fled his homeland in 1939. He was in his early 20s and like many other fleeing Polish Jews, he was arrested near the Russian border and sent to do slave labor in the salt mines of Siberia.

Isaac Moskowitz met Faiga Levin from Kiev in Uzbekistan and they married in 1945. Shortly afterward, they fled from Russia illegally, by bribing the border police. Sam Moskowitz was born at Stettin, a port city on the Baltic Sea while the couple was in transit.

Unable to find any of their family members, after the Kielce pogrom, they once again ran, finding their way to a DP camp in Regensburg, Germany, where they remained for three years. In Regensburg, they found Isaac's brother, also named Sam, who had survived Auschwitz.

In 1949, Moskowitz and his parents went to Israel where they settled in Kfar Yavne, near Rechovot. Isaac ran a fish store and Moskowitz has vivid memories of watching the live fish in his father's cement tank. Customers selected their fish and carried the live fish home unwrapped, because there was no wrapping paper.

After 10 years in Israel, Moskowitz, who was then a teenager, came with his parents to Canada.

He said they had good fortune when they rented a room above a Jewish grocery store on Baldwin Street owned by Anna Bermant, a widow who let them sell eggs and pickles and other products prepared by his mother and father.

"They worked seven days a week and when I came home from Harbord Collegiate, I would help them and Mrs. Bermant," Moskowitz recalled. "I worked with my parents at night making the products in wooden barrels and since my father didn't drive, I went with him by bus to the market in the early hours of the morning. As well, during the summer vacation, I worked at Shopsy's on Spadina Avenue.

"And for the first few years after I opened my law practice, I continued to drive my father to the Ontario Food Terminal in Etobicoke at 4 o'clock in the morning."

While at law school, Sam married Shelly Reisman. They have four children. Moskowitz' father died 13 years ago and his mother passed away recently.

Along with his passion for cooking, baking and preparing traditional pickled products learned from his parents, Moskowitz is actively involved in the community. He is on the board of the Shaarei Shomayim Congregation, and he recently organized an afternoon minyan at the Minsker Synagogue on St. Andrews Street in the Kensington Market.

"My office isn't far from the Kensington Market; so every day I am reminded of my roots and I'm grateful to my parents for giving me guidance and business experience.

"Many times I say that running a law practice is like being in a store because you have to satisfy your customers/clients. And some times they ask me for pickles along with my advice."

CRANANA NUT BREAD

1/2 cup butter (1 stick), room temperature
1 cup sugar
1/4 tsp salt
1/2 tsp ground cinnamon
1/4 tsp ground cloves
3 tsp grated orange zest
2 eggs, beaten
1 cup mashed ripe bananas
1 cup whole wheat flour
1 cup all purpose flour
1 1/2 tsp baking powder
1/2 cup chopped walnuts
1/4 cup dried cranberries

Preheat oven to 350°. Grease 9x5" loaf pan. Cream together butter, sugar, salt, cinnamon, cloves and orange zest in medium mixing bowl. Beat in eggs and banana pulp. Sift in flours and baking powder. Stir in walnuts and cranberries. Place batter in the greased loaf pan. Bake 1 hr. The bread is done when a toothpick inserted in the centre comes out clean. Cool in pan 15 mins, then transfer to rack to cool completely before slicing. Serving Suggestion: Cranana Bread also makes a delicious dessert. Butter a thick slice and toast it under the broiler. Serve with a scoop of good quality vanilla ice cream, topped with light sprinkling of cinnamon.

About jobs

Dear Lisa,

Surfing the Web is all the rage these days. If I search the right places, can I find out about who's hiring?

Dear Reader,

Using the Internet as a job search tool is a great idea. If you don't know much about the Internet, numerous books have been published which will help you. One book I like is the Canadian Internet Handbook by Jim Carroll and Rick Broadhead. It's available in most bookshops and might even be in your local library.

Once you're on-line, choose a search engine such as Yahoo, Webcrawler, Alta Vista, Lycos or InfoSeek. Then enter a word like "job." "employment" or "work." Watch while the door to a world of opportunities opens in front of you.

When I entered the word "job," I found over 55,000 entries that linked me to many different types of jobs including jobs for MBA grads, jobs in government, jobs in bands and jobs for people who spoke one particular language or another.

One location on the Internet I really like is CareerMosaic which can be found at [http://www.career mosaic.com]. Among its features, CareerMosaic has a database of currently available jobs which can be searched by region or occupation. It has links to many employers including hi-tech firms like Logitech and Motorola, and companies that are not linked to the computer industry, like hospitals, McDonald's and Wal-mart. CareerMosaic also shows you how to create a resume for use on the Internet. Suggestions about privatizing your information and making it highly accessible are useful and important.

If you don't have access to the Internet from home, visit a Cyber cafe. In North York, visit the new Cyber-Office Cafe at 5855 Yonge St. Cyber cafes charge people for time on one of their computers. In these cafes you can find word-processing software, fancy graphic design software, accounting software, scanners and some even have interactive software for kids. Discounts often exist for people who are unemployed.

If you want to find a Cyber cafe, you can check your city's phone directory or look on the Internet using a search engine of your choice. Cyber cafes are also called Cyber bars and Internet cafes. Hopefully, one of the 500 online locations will have an address you can visit in person.

Something else to think about is e-mail. If you are looking for a job in a company that uses computers to any extent, it is in your favor to have your own e-mail address, since many companies who advertise on the Internet do not give a postal address or phone number but only their e-mail address. If you want to set up your own e-mail account and don't have access at home, visit a Cyber cafe.

Job Search is a monthly column by job search consultant Lisa Galet. Readers are invited to send any questions they have for Lisa to The CJN

MOURNING IN BEIT EL

Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu, flanked by his Defence Minister Yitzhak Mordechai (left) and bodyguards, spoke last week at the funeral of Etta Tzur and her 12-year-old son Ephraim. The two were killed in a drive-by ambush near their home in Beit El on Dec. 11. Three terrorists from The Popular Front for the Liberation of Palestine (PFLP) attacked the Tzur family in their car, killing the mother and son and wounding the father and his four daughters aged four to 17. Dec. 11 was the 28th anniversary of the founding of the PFLP. Netanyahu told the mourners "Whoever thinks that by these acts of terror he will uproot the Jewish people from its country, from the heart of the Jewish homeland, should know that we will uproot him". [Reuters/RNS photo]

Bibi, Arafat allay fears

By DAVID MAKOVSKY, ARIEH O'SULLIVAN
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — Palestinian Authority Chairman Yasser Arafat phoned Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu last week in an apparent bid by both to calm tensions in the aftermath of recent violence, of a cabinet decision to extend financial incentives to settlers, and of charges by both sides that the other is out to undermine peace.

Arafat's call came as top negotiator Yitzhak Molcho and cabinet secretary Danny Naveh met with Arafat in Gaza.

According to a statement issued by the Prime Minister's Office, the two sides discussed prospects of moving forward on the Hebron talks.

Molcho reportedly briefed Arafat on the cabinet decision to provide financial incentives to settlers.

Foreign Minister David Levy was to brief the Jordanians on this decision in Amman and Defence Minister Yitzhak Mordechai was to travel to Cairo for the same purpose this week.

During the phone call, Arafat expressed sorrow for the killings of the wife and son of Yoel Tzur, who were gunned down outside Beit El last week by terrorists from the Popular Front for the Liberation of Palestine (PFLP).

Netanyahu also expressed sorrow for the killing of a Palestinian worker by an Israeli farmer in the Negev last week, the statement from the Prime Minister's Office said.

Arafat told Netanyahu that he has demanded the PFLP stop its terrorism.

CIFTA passes Senate

By RICHARD CLEROUX
CJN Columnist

OTTAWA — The Canada-Israel Free Trade Agreement (CIFTA) finally passed through Parliament this month in time to go into effect officially on Jan. 1, 1997 – just as we had promised the Israelis.

But in the process, the government of Benjamin Netanyahu, and by extension the state of Israel, took an awful verbal bashing.

Friends of Israel on Parliament Hill found themselves repeatedly on the defensive trying to defend the Israeli government.

In the Commons earlier this fall, and again in the Senate this month during the committee debates on the free trade deal, you could almost feel the mood changing against Israel.

Commentary

There was a hardening of attitudes, a certain suspicion of anything coming from the Netanyahu government that did not exist when the previous Israeli administration was in power.

That was why the Liberal government rushed the agreement through Parliament this fall, before the goodwill towards Israel deteriorated any further.

It wasn't about to risk losing the agreement altogether.

There was a feeling among a number of MPs and some senators that even though the free trade deal might be highly advantageous to Canadian business, it might be time to send a message to Israel that Canada did not approve of its approach to the peace process, and was even prepared to sacrifice a business advantage to make the point.

ISRAEL

Military Cooperation

JERUSALEM — Israel has received Western intelligence reports that Iran recently dispatched a squadron of combat jets to Syria.

The reports were unclear as to whether the jets were intended as a potential strike force against Israel or were part of a joint training exercise.

Military ties between Syria and Iran have strengthened in recent months, according to the latest assessments.

Soldier Guilty

JERUSALEM – A military court has found an Israeli soldier guilty of assault for punching a Toronto tourist in the nose after he stopped for directions last year.

Students Surveyed

JERUSALEM – A poll released in the Hebrew University student paper revealed that 33 percent of students on both campuses don't have sex – but 22 percent do it four or more times a week.

The poll of 300 students showed that the most sexually active female students are on the Givat Ram campus, where 30 percent have sex at least four times a week.

Jewish Homes Opposed

JERUSALEM – Palestinian officials warned last week that a plan to construct some 130 housing units for Jews in the heart of an Arab neighborhood in eastern Jerusalem could spark another wave of violence similar to the riots that erupted in September.

The plan, which calls for the building of homes in the Ras Al-Amud neighborhood, was approved by the Jerusalem Building and Planning Committee.

Palestinian Missiles

JERUSALEM – A spokesperson for the Israel Defence Force would not confirm a published report that Palestinian security officials are trying to obtain anti-tank and anti-aircraft missiles.

The report, published in Time magazine, cited Israeli intelligence officials as saying that the Palestinians are attempting to beef up their arsenals in the wake of the riots that erupted in September, when Israel deployed tanks and helicopters.

EGYPT SEEKS REASON TO END CEASEFIRE

Egypt has launched a campaign for an emergency meeting of the UN Security Council within the next few days, which would demand that Israel reply affirmatively to the jarring memo for withdrawal from occupied territory. If Israel refused, then UN mediator Jarring would be asked for a report of the mission which would be a failure, and justification for Egypt to end the ceasefire.

Earlier this week, the General Assembly of the UN adopted an Egyptian-backed resolution calling on Israel to withdraw from the Arab territory it has occupied since the June 1967 war. Despite a vigorous Israeli campaign to dilute the resolutions by amendment, the Arab draft was adopted by a vote of 79 to 7. The U.S. abstained.

Waidergorn takes over as new Israeli consul

FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A childhood dream of serving abroad as an Israeli diplomat has become a reality for Irit Waidergorn. Toronto's new Israeli consul, who replaced Haim Waxman at the end of November, is second in command at the Israeli consulate here.

The consulate, headed by consul general Jehudi Kinar, serves Ontario and western Canada. The one other Israeli consulate in Canada is located in Montreal.

Waidergorn, a native of Tel Aviv, arrived in Toronto following a two-year posting in Brazil, where she served as second secretary at the Israeli embassy in Brasilia and then vice-consul for three months in Sao Paulo.

"For me Sao Paulo was kind of a preparation for Canada," Waidergorn said recently in her new office. Like Toronto, Sao Paulo has a large and active Jewish community, she said.

The move also signified a transition from embassy work to consul work, the latter being less political and more oriented towards services such as providing visas and dealing with immigration issues.

Brasilia, with 50 Jewish families and one Chabad rabbi, was "a great experience, but Jewish-wise it's a whole new world [in Toronto]," said Waidergorn.

Her posting in Brasilia wasn't her first experience living in a predominantly non-Jewish community. As a high school student, Waidergorn spent six months on an exchange program in McMinville, Oregon where she was, in a sense, an unofficial ambassador for Israel.

She lived with a Presbyterian family and even sang Maoz Tzur at a school Christmas-Chanukah concert. One of the two Jewish families in the area took her under its wing for Rosh Hashanah and Yom Kippur.

Now 28, Waidergorn admits she started her diplomatic career at a young age. Although Israel's foreign ministry accepts applicants until the age of 33, most begin in their late 20s.

Waidergorn was younger, entering the diplomatic course in 1992 following her graduation from Tel Aviv University with a B.A. in Political Science. She was one of only 18 to be accepted that year. Last year, however, with new positions opening because of the peace process, the ministry accepted 40 people.

In her first ministry position, Waidergorn served in the press department, working in Israel on public relations for Egypt.

She expects the "peak" of her term here will be Israel's 50th anniversary of statehood in 1998.

The first challenge in a new posting is being accepted by local staff, she said. "They're very important. They were here before I came and they'll be here after I leave. I was very lucky with the team I found here. They are marvellous."

As a diplomat, her work has not changed substantially because of Israel's change in government earlier this year, she said. "This government wants peace the same as the other [did], only with some different aspects. The 'main' policy is going for peace and is continuing. There's no turning back. I'm very optimistic about the peace process, [but] I think patience is the key word."

The question of input from Diaspora Jewry on Israeli policy is an issue Waidergorn believes "you can't put rules on. Some will support the government, and some will not. I think there's a very active, open dialogue and it should continue."

From the editor's desk

Recalling some special moments of '96

We, the Jewish people in North America, differentiate our new year celebrations. Rosh Hashanah is a holy day; we pray, introverted and introspective, hopeful of a kind and gentle Judgement from the One Great Judge.

New Year's Eve is a holiday. We generally do not pray. But because it too is a chronological marker, it also lends itself to introspection and hoping.

Thus, as we stand on the edge of 1997, it is appropriate to look back upon the year that we are leaving.

The following are excerpts from some of the special moments that were recorded on the editor's desk in 1996.

On a rare Jerusalem moment: "Our last stop with him [our guide Yoni Shapira] was on Mount Scopus. We went to the campus of Hebrew University, to an alcove hewn into the rock at a high point on the hill looking south and southwest onto the Old City of Jerusalem and beyond. It was late in the afternoon. The sun was already low in the western sky, partially hidden behind a drapery of orange and red clouds. Below us lay the valley, beige and green, pale blue and gold. The Temple Mount sparkled. We sat on stone benches of concentric half circles. We were all tired...

Undoubtedly, it was due to the combination of the feelings of pleasant end-of-day fatigue, the dramatic ending of Shapira's story and the lovely, serene sunset settling upon Jerusalem before our eyes, that we all fell into a goose-bumpy silence. And then, as if in a Frank Capra film, one of the women sitting in the back row began to sing "Me'al pisgat Har Hatsofim" (From the summit of Mount Scopus).

Soon everyone was singing From the summit of Mount Scopus from the high summit of Mount Scopus. It was a rare moment." (Mar. 28)

On Theodore Herzl:

"Herzl...became a fixture, a permanent star in the constellation of idealism. He was a beacon. He cast a clear piercing beam into a gloomy Jewish world. He illuminated the corridors of nationalism which, to that point in modern history had remained dark and untravelled for Jews. He resuscitated a dream and he revived a people.

"Herzl's life is a reminder to us all, and to our young generation in particular, that human beings are the most precious unit of existence on this planet, that each individual is immeasurably significant, that individuals can change the course of history." (July 11)

On Natan Sharansky: "One of the first things one notices about Natan Sharansky is his puckish grin.

"Despite the heavy lines beginning to develop under his eyes, proof of the numerous briefing documents, novels, biographies, math tomes, and chess books that occupy him late into the night, he has a remarkably innocent, child-like countenance.

"He speaks totally without pretense or prepared text, in command of an English vocabulary which is after all, his second or third language. Occasionally, he stops to find the precise word, the one that enables him to convey thoughts and express ideas winnowed to highly refined detail, nuance and meaning.

"Five television cameras are filming him. Their lights shine directly into his face. He is oblivious to their intrusion. He sits at a finely polished mahogany or cherry wood table in a high-backed, upholstered chair alongside his gracious Canadian counterpart and host, Art Eggleton. His feet do not reach the floor.

"Hands folded neatly in front of him, he begins to swing his legs, one resting near the ankle on top of the other, under the table. He is playfully calm. There is very little congruity between the image of the short legs swinging happily under that table and the phalanx of intergovernmental formality that he faces." (Aug. 8)

On the families bearing the cost of a Jewish education: "Because the financial burden of formal Jewish education is very great, we begrudge no family that decides not to bear it. But, precisely because that financial burden is so great, we commend the families that persevere, moving slowly under the weight, scratching deep furrows into their freedoms. Their achievement was enshrined by the psalmist who sang: "Hazor'im b'dim'ah, b'rinah yiktsoru." They who sow with tears and great effort, will surely harvest with a sense of great joy." (Aug. 29)

CORRECTION

Certain errors crept into the essay on the Jews of Amsterdam by Prof. Joseph Michman, which appeared in our Chanukah greetings supplement Dec. 5. We wish to correct them.

On page B4: "the truce between Spain and Amsterdam should have read between Spain and the Dutch Republic. On page B5 Prince Maurits was Stadtholder of the Dutch Republic and not governor of Amsterdam. On page B7 the phrase should have read, Council of State instead of The States-General. We apologize to the author, whose latest book Dutch Jewry During the Emancipation Period was published last year by Amsterdam University Press, Amsterdam.

Lawyers blamed for 'furor' over secret meeting

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The media "furor and turmoil" that resulted from the meeting between the chief judge of the Federal Court and a senior government official was actually the creation of lawyers acting for three alleged Nazi war criminals, the Federal Court of Appeal was told last week.

"The media has a willing ear for scandal and the more scandalous and irresponsible the better," said Toronto lawyer Ian Binnie, representing the Justice Department.

"It is not good enough for my friends [lawyers for the three alleged war criminals] to have created a furor in the press and stand back, wring their hands and shed crocodile tears" about newspaper editorials they helped induce, Binnie said.

Referring to editorials in the Ottawa Citizen and the Toronto Globe and Mail that had been presented to the appellate court, Binnie said they were "the wash from the turbulence" created by [the three lawyers] so as to stampede the judiciary and prevent them from giving "a sober second look" at the lower court decision staying the three cases.

Binnie, a lawyer in private practice who has been retained to represent the Justice Department, was responding to a series of preliminary arguments presented by lawyers for alleged war criminals Helmut Oberlander, Johann Dueck and Erichs Tobiass.

Earlier this year, Federal Court Judge Bud Cullen granted a stay of proceedings in the three cases because of a meeting between Federal Court Chief Justice Julius Isaac and Ted Thompson, assistant deputy attorney general. Cullen said the meeting tainted the court with the appearance of government interference.

"In my view, this affront to judicial independence is the clearest of cases and a stay of proceedings in each of the three respondent cases will be granted," he ruled.

The stay decision effectively put an end to the three cases, but government lawyers appealed the decision to the Federal Court of Appeal. Lawyers for the alleged war criminals opened the appeal hearing with several preliminary arguments suggesting: the court did not have jurisdiction to hear the case; the "collegiality" of the court and Isaac's role in it raises the question of perceived bias; the Supreme Court of Canada ought to hear the case; and one of the three members of the appeals panel, Judge Louis Marceau, had made a statement suggesting there was a cloud over the court and so he could not be in a position of adjudicating that very issue.

But Binnie said the three lawyers were "quick to make allegations for which there is no evidence whatsoever."

He dismissed suggestions that the collegiality of the court prevents it from dealing with the issue before it. Courts regularly address cases of bias and do so in a professional manner, he said. Pointing to a Supreme Court of Canada decision, he said it underlines the principle that judges will fulfil their oaths of office and deal with cases fairly.

"You have nothing to gain by reversing [Cullen's] decision and nothing to lose by upholding it," Binnie said.

Earlier, lawyers Donald Bayne and Michael Code, representing Dueck and Oberlander, argued there was no appeal from a stay order and Bayne suggested such an appeal could open the floodgates to an "endless series of appeals at every stage."

Government lawyers were making an absurd argument when they suggested no appeal was available to the Federal Court of Appeal on the merits of the case (whether the men lied about their past when they became citizens), but there were appeals on interim matters like a stay application, Bayne said.

Code argued the Federal Court of Appeal has a professional relationship with Isaac. "That leads clearly to the appearance that there might be partiality" and an apparent conflict of interest.

He also suggested there was "an irresistible inference" that judges may have discussed with Isaac the issues before the court.

He said Marceau's statement that there was a cloud over the court suggests other Federal Court judges felt criticism levelled at Isaac was being felt by them as well.

Bayne said Marceau was in the position of having to adjudicate his own statements. That was "an impossible situation" and the court ought to decline to hear the case. The Supreme Court of Canada is available to decided the matter, he added.

That last argument did not go over well with Judge Louis Pratte, who said he knew of no instances where the Supreme Court heard a case that had not been adjudicated by a Court of Appeal. "I've heard your argument," Pratte told Bayne. "I don't agree with it."

Fromm under investigation

TORONTO — The Peel board of education has been asked to determine whether teacher Paul Fromm has violated the board's multicultural policies by associating with racists and Holocaust deniers.

The request came from the League for Human Rights of B'nai Brith Canada. The League pointed out that a 1993 Ministry of Education inquiry found that Fromm breached the board's multicultural and race relations policy as well as the regulations of the Ontario Teachers' Federation and that Fromm "is not committed to ethnocultural equity policies." The League also noted that Fromm had been warned the board would not tolerate conduct that damaged the employer/employee relationship.

The League alleged in a news release that in November 1994, Fromm spoke at a memorial symposium for Revilio Oliver, a longtime proponent of racism and anti-Semitism. Also speaking there was former Ku Klux Klan wizard David Duke.

The League provided Harold Brathwaite, the Peel board's director of education, with a synopsis of a videotape recorded at the event. The League told Brathwaite that it has "evidence placing Fromm at a similar conference in Vancouver in April" and that there is evidence that Fromm promoted materials by Malcolm Ross, a former Moncton school teacher who has written books that attacked Jews.

Peace Now blasts statements by Palestinians

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — In an open letter to the Palestine Authority's (PA) representative in Ottawa, Canadian Friends of Peace Now has blasted statements by PA officials which contravene the 1995 Oslo 2 agreement.

The Nov. 29 letter, signed by Peace Now co-presidents Simon Rosenblum and Frank Guttman, was addressed to Dr. Baker Abdel Munem.

Rosenblum and Guttman, ardent supporters of the Oslo peace process and of a two-state solution to the Arab-Israeli conflict, claim that leading members of the PA from Yasser Arafat downward are in "serious violation" of Article XXII of the Oslo accord.

The clause states that Israel and the PA "shall seek to foster mutual understanding and tolerance, and shall accordingly abstain from incitement, including hostile propaganda against each other."

In a hard-hitting letter, Rosenblum and Guttman accuse PA officials of praising terrorists who have killed Israeli citizens and of falsely accusing Israel's army of plotting terrorist attacks against Israelis by arming and assisting Islamic fundamentalists.

Rosenblum and Guttman also take the PA to task for threatening armed struggle should final-status negotiations fail to produce a Palestinian state in the West Bank and Gaza Strip, and of suggesting that such a Palestininan state is merely "a way station on the way to recapturing all of historic Palestine."

Attached to their letter is a lengthy list of objectionable remarks delivered by PA officials from Sept. 1, 1993 to Oct. 29, 1996.

Rosenblum and Guttman, while making allowances for misquotations, poor translations or statements taken out of context, contend that the PA is in fact guilty of contravening the Oslo agreement.

As they put it: "It is often said that certain language is directed for the consumption of one's internal constituencies, and should not be looked upon as reflecting the true intentions of the Palestinian leadership. We do not find that argument satisfactory, as mutual trust demands speaking with one tongue.

"While we remain convinced that the core leadership of the PA does fundamentally see a Palestinian state alongside Israel as the final conclusion of the dispute between the two peoples, any remarks which even indirectly suggest otherwise are in total violation of both the texts and spirit of the peace process.

"We also believe it highly irresponsible to begin preparing, rhetorically or otherwise, for a resumption of violence if the peace process collapses...

"We hope that there will be a quick and complete cessation of remarks of the kind noted, and look forward to working together in achieving our mutual goals of independence, prosperity, peace and security."

In an interview, Rosenblum said that the purpose of the letter was to put on record Peace Now's growing concerns regarding the PA's deviations from the Oslo process.

"We have been concerned for some time," he said. "Until now, we expressed our views in private."

Rosenblum said Peace Now had taken the matter directly to Arafat. "He acknowledged that it was a problem, but claimed that he always had been misquoted."

Asked whether Dr. Munem had replied to his letter, Rosenblum said he did not expect an answer.

The CJN called Dr. Munem, who doubles as the Palestine Liberation Organization's representative in Canada, for a comment, but he did not respond.

Rosenblum said he and Guttman decided to act when they concluded that PA officials were threatening Israel with another intifadah, the Palestinian revolt which broke out in 1987 and more or less lasted until Israel and the PLO signed the Declaration of Principles in September 1993.

"The straw that broke the camel's back was all this loose talk. PA officials were saying that if the peace process ground to a halt because of (Benjamin) Netanyahu's intransigence, the armed struggle would resume."

Rosenblum expressed surprise and disappointment that Palestinian leaders whom Peace Now considered moderates, such as Faisal al-Husseini (the PLO's chief official in Jerusalem) and Nabil Shaath (the PA's planning minister), had made some of the offending statements.

"It's one thing for the Palestinians to return to non-violent disobedience," he said."It's another to go back to armed struggle, which'll put the Middle East far back. As we go on, these statements can affect the peace process negatively."

Homeless find place to rest at Holy Blossom Temple

By RON CSILLAG
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO – The sign in the hall downstairs spells out the rules: no smoking, no drugs or alcohol, no weapons and no abusive language or behavior.

The rules seem unnecessary, though, as the crowd is polite, well-behaved, almost genteel. On this wet and bracing night, 38 homeless men and some women have come to Holy Blossom Temple for a hot meal, some gentle banter from synagogue volunteers and, for most of them, a place to rest.

Holy Blossom has become the first synagogue in Canada to take in homeless people – not just for a fast bowl of soup, but for a complete meal and a place to sleep for the night.

The temple has become a full-fledged part of Toronto's decade-old Out of the Cold program, which offers the homeless a meal and somewhere to bed down seven nights a week during the winter months in 32 Metro churches (and now, one synagogue, every Thursday night until the end of March).

The program was inaugurated Dec. 5 at Holy Blossom, when some 30 people came for dinner and of whom 20 remained to sleep in the downstairs Phillip Smith foyer.

Last Thursday, the number swelled somewhat, likely a result of word getting around that another venue was open. Guests, as they are called, tucked into hot pea soup, orange barbecue chicken, salad and tutti-frutti cake for dessert. As it was the last night of Chanukah, they were also served latkes and received a bagged lunch for the next day containing gold chocolate coins. It was all done in a quiet, comfortable, dignified setting. About 30 slept over.

Temple volunteers prepare the food, do the serving and engage the guests in conversation. At last count, the program has signed up some 250 volunteers, something Holy Blossom's newly installed president, Morris Cooper, finds heartening.

"This program has generated a level of excitement I've never seen," he told The CJN. "It's brought out the best in our volunteers."

But the road to this quality of mercy wasn't always smooth. For weeks before the program was launched, temple members and area residents voiced concerns about health and safety issues. Many were parents of children attending Leo Baeck Day School in the temple.

"I was a skeptic too," admits Cooper. "I mean, I live a block away and have kids."

The concerns revolved around stereotypes of the homeless; that they are dangerous and carry disease. "These aren't frightening people," says Cooper, surveying the crowd. "They're just down on their luck."

Another worry was that the homeless would flock to the upscale neighborhood surrounding the temple. "They're already here," Cooper counters. "They're in the Cedarvale ravine. You can find them sleeping in bank foyers right on Eglinton Avenue."

Most concerns have been allayed, temple officials say. A police officer from 13 Division spoke to members and neighbors, saying that the vast majority of homeless don't cause problems. A City of York public health officer explained that the chances of contracting disease from the homeless were "extraordinarily low." As well, a uniformed security guard stays overnight.

In addition, dinner was pushed back from 6 p.m. to 6:30, hours after the last child has left classes. Guests are woken early, fed breakfast and are gone by the time school starts. They sleep in their own clothes on plastic-covered mattresses.

Some even receive clothes donated by other synagogues and the National Council of Jewish Women. Small toiletries are also distributed.

About 200 temple volunteers prepared themselves by taking part in a "mentoring" program last year at St. Andrew's Presbyterian church. Now, "we have developed the prototype" for synagogues, says program chair Freda Muscovitch. "There are some [shuls] in the United States that provide soup kitchens, but we're the first to do this."

For Dan, a 36-year-old homeless man, Holy Blossom is the place to be Thursday nights.

A college-trained computer programmer, he says he used to work in the insurance industry and at Canada Post before a head injury sidelined him four years ago. "I don't want to go to any place," Dan told The CJN, "but if you have to go, you'll know you'll be treated well [here]. We can go quite some time before someone is nice to us.

"This place is a reminder that we do have some class."

Soviet Holocaust files may take ages to analyze

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The collapse of the Soviet Union has finally given researchers in Israel and elsewhere access to previously closed archives relating to the Holocaust, says Yad Vashem Museum's chief historian.

But the material yet to be examined is so voluminous, it may well take another century to plumb its secrets, explained David Silberklang in an interview.

To illustrate the problem, Silberklang said that while Yad Vashem – the Holocaust memorial and museum in Jerusalem — possesses 50 million pages of documentation pertaining to the shoah, a single archive in Moscow, one of dozens in the former Soviet Union, may have many more.

During Soviet times, such archives were strictly off-limits to Western historians. But since 1990, when the first ones were opened to foreign scrutiny, researchers have been given permission to sift through the trove.

Yad Vashem has been in the forefront of these efforts but after six years of working through the files, historians are still in the dark about many aspects of the Holocaust in the ex-Soviet Union, he said.

"We still don't know a lot," admitted Silberklang, who delivered a speech here about Jewish and non-Jewish responses to the Holocaust.

"We don't know much about the eastern Ukraine, especially the smaller Jewish communities there. We don't know how many Jews were evacuated by Soviet forces."

And, he noted, there are still yawning gaps in our knowledge of the way in which Jewish communities responded to the German occupation "We can't rely only on Nazi documents. They're not objective."

Apart from these conundrums, he said, researchers have yet to fully grasp events which unfolded outside the borders of the Soviet Union.

• France has not opened all its archives. "The French have trouble with their past," observed Silberklang, whose appearance in Toronto was sponsored by the Canadian Society for Yad Vashem, Congregation Beth Habonim, the March of the Living, the Holocaust Remembrance Committee and the United Jewish Appeal.

• The role of the Red Cross and the Vatican remains subject to clarification.

• The policy of Switzerland's cantons is largely shrouded in mystery.

David Silberklang

• The policies of countries such as Turkey and Finland remain somewhat unclear.

• The status of dispossessed Jewish property in German-ruled territory is an open question.

"There's still plenty more to be done," said Silberklang, a 40-year-old New Yorker who has lived in Israel since 1982.

Silberklang, who is also editor-in-chief of Yad Vashem Studies, said that the Allied powers were not really in a position to rescue Jews in the first years of the war. "At that point, they were losing badly, and were remote from the killing grounds. They were basically trying to survive."

Nonetheless, the Allies could have done more on behalf of Jews, he added. They could expressed compassion, welcomed Jewish escapees, sent funds and threatened the leaders of the Axis bloc with retribution.

In his view, the United States contributed the most to saving lives by establishing the War Refugee Board in 1944. According to one estimate, the WRB rescued 200,000 persons, mainly Hungarian Jews, from certain death.

Canada's approach was, at best, callous.

Even though the Allies issued a joint declaration about the Holocaust in December 1942, they did not fully grasp the extent of the systematic destruction of European Jewry until the end of the war, he said.

The German public had a "fair idea" of what was going on. "By and large, as a group, they knew about the Final Solution. The murder of the Jews was essentially a 'public secret.' "

Silberklang said that Daniel Goldhagen's recently-published book, Hitler's Willing Executioners, has reinforced our understanding of the killing process. "But his explanation of why it happened is one-dimensional and simplistic. I, personally, haven't read a valid explanation."

Poland's record is ambivalent. "Poland is a mixed bag. It's an exaggeration that the Poles were worse than the Nazis. It's a fact that some Poles risked their lives trying to help Jews. But, given the number of Jews in Poland, Poles had more of an opportunity to help them."

And Silberklang, the son of Polish survivors, claims that Poland's leaders were insufficiently energetic in attempting to rescue Jews.

In general, he went on to say, the people of the Baltic states and the western part of Ukraine were "very unhelpful. And yet you find gentile rescuers."

Of all the countries dominated by the Germans, Denmark compiled the best record in its treatment of Jews, he said.

Although it resisted the deportation of its citizens, Bulgaria passed anti-Semitic laws and permitted the Nazis to deport 11,000 Jews in Bulgarian-occupied Macedonia and Thrace, he pointed out.

Silberklang said that Holland's record is over-inflated, given the fact that 90 percent of its Jewish citizens perished during the Holocaust.

Unity, here

This is the last issue of The CJN in 1996. The terrain on which we have travelled this past year — as individuals, as a people and as a nation — was strewn, it seems, with more than the usual political, social and economic obstacles.

In Canada, we try desperately not to trip on the possibility of Quebec's separation. Thus preoccupied, we have lately altered our gait, making it more tentative, more halting. We seek out our responsibilities with our eyes low, our gaze close to the ground. Caution and prudence are commendable in proper measure. But great is our loss when they predominate, when we no longer "lift our eyes unto the mountains," towards a horizon where the sun is deeply golden and the sky is azure blue, where belief in our causes is unshaken and commitment to communal action is inexhaustible.

The Jewish community in Quebec is feeling pessimistic about its future. Given the political instability and the resulting economic uncertainty since the last referendum, pessimism is hardly surprising. As The CJN noted earlier this year, "the Jews of Quebec are constantly tuned into, constantly reacting to, constantly assessing and constantly debating political developments. Everyone bears within him a small, disquieting but fatiguing, inner agitation over the political situation." But the community in Quebec is hardy, determined to live a meaningful, rewarding, highly organized life, there, within Canada, in the culturally distinct and thriving neighborhoods that most have known and loved for generations.

It falls, therefore, to the Jews in the "rest of Canada" to help them. But in this important intra-communal cause, helping "them" means helping all Canadians.

In the struggle for Canada's future, the Jewish community must "lift its eyes" to envision and actively fight for a just, prosperous, generous, united country, a country which ties together the magnificent differences and distinctions of its diverse and powerful regions into one great strength.

...and in Israel

In Israel, on a landscape of frustrating peace partners, violent terrorist outrages, implacable hostility from Islamic fundamentalists, constant condemnation from its neighbors, and recurring criticism from the western media, the people try to find a secure path to peace with the Palestinians and the Syrians, even as they try to avoid falling into the seemingly widening internal fractures and fissures.

In our view, the terrain's most dangerous pitfall is that of Jewish fractiousness. The nation is divided along severely entrenched ideological lines, frequently excessively partisan politics and religious and secular schisms. It is still wounded from Yitzhak Rabin's assassination.

The most important task facing the Jewish people as we step into the doorway of 1997 is to heal the fractures and to close the fissures, wherever and however possible. Extremism of any stripe must be rejected. In its place, tolerance, mutual respect and a sense of kinship and shared destiny must be embraced.

There is no denying the immeasurable, almost metaphysical, surge of strength that flows through the Jewish people when we are united. The Book of Esther (9:2) captures its essence perfectly in a very few words: "The Jews assembled and united together... and no force was able to stand against them."

When the stresses seem least bearable, the Jewish people must become most responsive. Our history has taught us how. Our responsibilities tell us when. And the situation tells us: Now.

If Canada had acted on war criminals

Your editorial, "Another Name" (CJN, Dec. 5), on the conviction and sentencing of Drazen Erdemovic applauds and acknowledges a small but important step by the International Criminal Tribunal at The Hague dealing with crimes against humanity. The Court rejected a plea based on the defence of simply following orders. The irony is that our own Supreme Court of Canada in the Imre Finta case exonerated him for that very reason. Because of that regrettable decision by Canada's highest court, all criminal prosecutions were brought to a halt, leaving only denaturalization and deportation as a vehicle for bringing Canada's own war criminals to justice.

Might I suggest that the knowledge of judicial accountability may well deter future mass murderers. How terribly sad, therefore, that Canada and the rest of the world were so negligent and irresponsible in dealing with Nazi war criminals because, had it been otherwise, we might not have witnessed the horrific events that took place in Cambodia, the former Yugoslavia and Rwanda. If prosecuting could have acted as a deterrent, is it not fair to ask who is more culpable, those who committed horrendous and heinous crimes or, those who did nothing to pursue and punish the perpetrators.

Bert Raphael
President
Jewish Civil Rights Educational Foundation of Canada

Pollard fared worse than war criminal

Strange are the ways of justice:

Drazen Erdemovic, a soldier in the Bosnian army, was recently found guilty of crimes against humanity, at the International War Crimes tribunal in The Hague. He admitted killing "up to 100" Muslims during the Bosnian War. His sentence: 10 years. With good behavior, he could be released before then.

Jonathan Pollard, a naval intelligence analyst, pleaded guilty in 1985 of passing classified information to Israel. His sentence: life, with a recommendation that he never be paroled. He has already served over 11 years of his sentence, with no end in sight.

I can only assume, therefore, that mass murder isn't as serious a crime as giving Israel information needed to defend itself. Israel was legally entitled to this information, but it was withheld by individuals in the American administration.

Saying 'no' can make a difference

What will we teach our children about the Holocaust 25 years from now ? To me there is an important need to see our responsibility as one of passing on a notion of "living memory" from generation to generation. We need to think of ourselves as witnesses, even though we are not witnesses in the sense that survivors are.

One way of making this concrete is by seeing ourselves as links in a chain of connections. As someone who has known a survivor, I need to pass on that experience to my children who then can claim that they knew someone who knew a survivor, and so on. This is a way of both personalizing the Holocaust, always a powerful learning device, and also building our capacity to fight Holocaust deniers.

Another is to make connections, to talk about the particular evil of anti-Semitism and its most horrific manifestation, but also to link these horrors to those of other people who also are suffering because someone with more power has decided that they are less than fully human.

Finally, however, we also need to talk about and remember the people who made a difference, who chose to look and act when others turned away. We need to use them as role models, because in order to work against present and future horrors, we need to ensure that more and more of us and our children are involved actively in saying "no." We need to let our children know what happens when too many people do not say "no," and also that saying "no" can make an incredible difference.

Certainly I would not be alive without the man who regularly left a piece of bread for my mother, or the Italian workers who cut the electric wires with which the Nazis planned to electrocute the Jewish slaves, my mother among them, at the labor camp Salzvedle as the war came to an end.

Perspectives

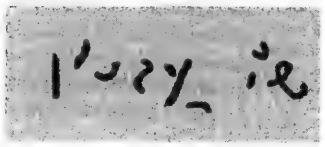
May we take pleasure in peace abundant

On Dec. 10, 1966, Shmuel Yosef Agnon (S.Y. Agnon) of Israel and Nelly Sachs of Sweden shared the Nobel Prize for Literature. The CJN wishes to recall that moment for its readers.

In this issue, we publish the address delivered by Agnon at the state banquet in honor of the Nobel laureates. In a future issue we will provide an essay about Nelly Sachs.

In S.Y. Agnon, A Book That Was Lost and Other Stories, Alan Mintz and Anne Golomb Hoffman wrote: "Many storytellers have arisen to tell the story of East European Jewry, but the achievement of S.Y. Agnon remains singular.

Agnon's address at the banquet provides touching proof of that achievement.



By SHMUEL YOSEF AGNON

As a result of the historic catastrophe in which Titus of Rome destroyed Jerusalem and banished Israel from its land, I was born in one of the cities of the exile. But I have always seen myself as having been born in Jerusalem.

I was five when I composed my first poem out of longing for my father, who was away on a business trip. I wrote many more poems, all of which were destroyed when my father's house, in which I had left the manuscripts, was burnt down during World War I.

And the young artisans, the tailors and shoemakers, who used to recite my poems while they worked, were killed in the First War. And of those who were not killed in that war, some were buried alive together with their sisters in a pit which they dug for themselves at the command of the enemy, and most were burnt in the crematoria of Auschwitz together with their sisters, who had adorned our city with their beauty, and who, with their voices so sweet, had sung my songs.

Many of the works I composed later were burnt in a fire which destroyed my home in Bad Homburg while I was in hospital. These included a novel about 300,000 words long, and a book I wrote together with Martin Buber, as well as some 4,000 Hebrew books which I had inherited or bought.

The King of Sweden presents the Nobel Prize to Agnon. [Ariel Magazine 1966/67]

Sketch by Moshe Gat

Then I returned to Palestine, settling in Jerusalem, after having been a chalutz, and I lived in Jaffa for a while when I was 19. In Jerusalem, because of its merit, I wrote all that God put into my heart and pen, including two books, Yamim Nora'im (The Days of Awe) and one on the giving of the Torah at Sinai, Atem Re'item.

In my writing I have been influenced first and foremost by the Bible, Mishnah, Talmud, Midrash and Rashi's commentary on the Bible. The next influences were the medieval halachic commentators, Hebrew poets and philosophers led by Maimonides. I also used to read every book in German that came to hand.

I was influenced by every man and every woman and every child who happened my way, both Jews and non-Jews. The conversations of people, the stories they told, were engraved on my heart, and some of them came up into my pen. The same is true of the scenes of nature. The Dead Sea which I used to see from the roof of my house every day at the peep of dawn, the Brook Arnon in which I used to bathe, the nights which I used to spend with men of pious thought and righteous action at the Wailing Wall — all of these gave me eyes to see the Land of the Blessed Holy One, which He gave us, and the city upon which He established His name. And in order not to slight any creature, I must also mention the animals of the yard and the beasts of the field and the birds of the air, from which I learned. Some of what I learned from them I have written down in my books.

But I fear that I did not learn as much as I should have. For when I hear the sound of a dog barking, the voice of a bird piping, the call of a cock crowing, I do not know whether they are thanking me for what I have told about them or whether they are calling me to task.

May He Who gives wisdom to the wise and salvation to kings increase your wisdom without measure and elevate your king without limit. In his days and in ours may Judah be redeemed and may Israel dwell in safety. May the Redeemer come to Zion, and may the earth be filled with knowledge and with joy everlasting to all its inhabitants, and may they take pleasure in peace abundant.

How The New York Times reported the Nobel Prize ceremony Dec. 11, 1966

"When it was his turn to be presented, Mr. Agnon jumped to his feet and enthusiastically shook the King's hand as he received the prize. Then, instead of the usual single bow to the King, he kept on bowing until he got back to his chair. He was obviously a very happy and flustered man. When he learned in October in Jerusalem that he had won the Nobel Prize, Mr. Agnon said that going to Stockholm would give him special pleasure "because there is a special benediction one says before a king and I have never met a king before." Tonight at the banquet, as the King looked on, Mr. Agnon, speaking in Hebrew, recited the blessing, "Blessed art Thou, O Lord our God, King of the universe, who has given of His glory to flesh and blood." The Israeli author said that "some see in my books the influences of authors whose names, in my ignorance, I have not even heard, while others see the influences of poets whose names I have heard but whose writing I have never read."

The true sources of his inspiration, he went on, were first and foremost, the sacred scriptures and, after that, the teachings of the medieval Jewish sages, and the spectacle of nature, and the animals of the earth."

Opinions

Israel after Yitzhak Rabin

By Emil Fackenheim

The most important event in Israel since the assassination of Yitzhak Rabin has been, of course, the election and the subsequent change of government, the first chance Israelis have had to vote on the Oslo accord. It is significant that Jews voted for the change by a large margin.

Among the causes have doubtless been not only distrust of the Oslo partner, Yasser Arafat, but also concern for Jews and Judaism. With talk in the former government, or among those close to it, about "post-Zionism," even calls to abolish the Law of Return and the Hatikvah, voters had reason to worry about Jerusalem, and — as writer Aharon Megged, a Labor supporter put it — the threat of "Zionist suicide."

Since taking office, the government has made its share of mistakes. This must not however, obscure its most important achievement thus far. In his acceptance speech, Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu promised peace among Jews prior to peace between Arabs and Israelis. Since then, he has kept his promise in one crucial respect — acceptance rather than repudiation of the written Oslo accord commitments made by his predecessor.

He did not falter even in the September disturbances, but merely let the disturbances give added significance to his contribution to the political dictionary — "reciprocity." The least an Israeli government can expect when it gives arms to Palestinian Authority (PA) "policemen" is that they will not turn them on Israeli soldiers. When this happened, Netanyahu had the right, both legal and moral, to treat the Oslo accord as null and void, but he did not.

The failure to recognize this achievement is largely due to the media, more shameless in their bias than ever. But owing to Israel's situation — besieged since birth, too many wars, no risk-free solution for the Arab-Israeli problem — the concept of "loyal opposition" is poorly developed in Israel. The opposition must criticize the government, but may not undermine it.

Recently leftist leader Yossi Sarid was correct when he warned sabre-rattling President Hafez al-Assad not to be tempted by the appearance of an Israel impotent in divisiveness; in case of war all Israel would be united.

But this lesson is not always learned. The most divisive slogan currently around is probably, "Hast thou killed and also taken possession?" (This is an allusion to the biblical Elijah who rebuked King Ahab for having Nabot murdered and then taking his vineyard that he had coveted, I Kings 21:19.) But Netanyahu did not plot Yitzhak Rabin's murder, nor did Israeli Orthodoxy, of which Yigal Amir is a very aberrant member.

Nor did one of the two major Israeli parties gain while the other lost through the murder. All Israel lost a universally respected leader, mourned also by Israelis who disagreed with his later policies. And if for some of the young in Israel Rabin has become an icon, they are right at least in part. A live Rabin could not have got what all Israel wants — a real peace with no risks left.

Neither French President Jacques Chirac nor British Foreign Minister Malcolm Rifkind would have dared to visit and to to popularity acclaimed Rabin what they did to popularity sniped at Netanyahu: propose a peace in which the Arabs got everying, Israel nothing, not even revocation of the PLO Covenant, Chirac seemed to go out of his way to insult Israel. And Rifkind came here to pronounce that the Israeli settlements in the territories are "illegal." He cannot have been ignorant of the ABC of Israeli-Arab "legality" — UN Resolution 242's call for Israeli withdrawal "from occupied territories," not "the occupied territories." The Arabs have tried ever since to smuggle the "the" back in. Rifkind came to join the smugglers.

I have stressed the political, for everything else is bound up with it. The Orthodox and the Haredim voted last election, many for the first time, because they felt under attack by leftist militant secularism. It would not be wise to let this conflict freeze into a permanent religious-cum-right-wing versus a secularist-cum-left-wing one, let alone to exacerbate that conflict. The Orthodox have exercised the privilege of Israeli citizenship by voting. Now let them accept its responsibilities also by military service or its equivalent. This is the road to greater Israeli unity.

It is the road to greater Israeli-Diaspora unity also. Soon after "the handshake," the Central Conference of American Rabbis (CCAR) held a conference in Jerusalem, but invited only Yitzhak Rabin, Shimon Peres and Faissal Huseini to address them. Was Netanyahu against peace, rather than merely against this road to it? The CCAR was rescued by protests; Netanyahu was invited, belatedly, hastily. But the respected organization would have come to Israel to make the polarization of besieged Israel still wider, when the task of visiting delegations should only be to narrow it.

That this Diaspora attitude toward Israel has not vanished is perhaps best shown by a recent statement in Tikkun (II no. 2) "American Jews," editor Michael Lerner asserts, "should now stand firm in demanding a new Zionism based on the sanctity of every human being," hence on "Palestinian national self-determination." The "old Zionists" of the Labor government at least risked being shot at themselves when they gave the PA "police" arms. Lerner's "new Zionists," a Zionism-away-from-Zion, run no such risks. Perhaps this explains why they can stand so firm.

Israel is the only truly radical response to the catastrophe of the Holocaust, the only truly radical commitment to a Jewish future. This is how we must look at the grave problems presently facing us.

Memorial in Berlin

By Rabbi Gunther Plaut

A year ago, the news media reported extensively on a mega-project planned by the City of Berlin. It was to be the Holocaust Memorial to end all memorials — fit for the city where Hitler reigned and where, in one of the suburbs, the final plan was hatched to destroy every last Jew in Europe.

Now, the reports went, Berlin would at last recognize its past and would build a monument the size of a football field: a huge, inclined cement slab, which would be inscribed with millions of names of Nazi victims. The slab would be part of an ongoing exhibt that was to be entitled, The Topography of Terror.

But a few weeks ago, it was announced that the Berlin government, pressed to trim its spending, had decided to postpone the project until the year 2000. That in turn caused widespread criticism — especially in view of the negative comment that had been directed not only against the "superslab," but against the need for having a memorial altogether. In the midst of this growing controversy, the city-state's parliament indicated that it would reconsider the postponement.

All of this happened during the period into which the two major commemorative days of Germany's modern era fall: in 1938, when the events began that have become known as Kristallnacht, and in 1989, when the Berlin Wall came down marking the reunification of East and West Germany.

The Week in Germany, which summarizes the major contacts of German newspapers had this to say: "Underscoring the need to keep memory of the past alive for future generations, German Jews and gentiles alike paid their respects over the weekend to the memory of the German Jews killed and terrorized 58 years ago. On the night of Nov. 9-10, 1938, Nazi officials led attacks on Jews, synagogues and businesses owned by Jews throughout Germany. Many were killed, their synagogues were set ablaze and some 30,000 Jews were arrested for deportation to concentration camps. This terrible event... must not fade from memory if future generations are to be spared the consequences of intolerance, racism and xenophobia."

In Dachau, which housed a concentration camp of terrible memory, the president of the German Parliament, Rita Suessmuth, moderated a discussion between young people and one-time prisoners in the camp. A former inmate of Buchenwald, another camp of ill fate, reminded participants in a memorial service in Frankfurt of the tremendous loss to their culture that Germany had suffered as a result of the Holocaust. "Germany and all of Europe," he said, "still feel the loss today."

After stressing the importance of preserving memory of the Nazi reign of terror and the Holocaust, Ignatz Bubis, chair of the Central Council of Jews in Germany, challenged Germany's educators to broaden their coverage of he history of Germany's minority beyond the period of the Third Reich.

There are plenty of people who would like to see this whole problem go away. But there are enough others in Germany who feel that without acknowledging its memories, Germany is much less than it ought to be.

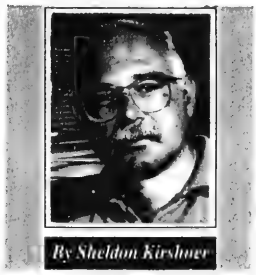
Recalling the Bernonville affair

Last month, Jean-Louis Roux, the lieutenant-governor of Quebec, resigned under duress, falling victim to what may



By Sheldon Kirshner

charitably be called a youthful indiscretion. In 1942, while taking part in an anti-conscription rally that turned anti-Semitic, he wore a swastika on his sleeve.

If nothing else, the Roux incident underlined the degree to which French Canadian society was impregnated with anti-Semitism, a topic scholar Esther Delisle deftly examined in The Traitor and the Jew.

The Bernonville affair, which many Quebeckers have forgotten, also highlights this disturbing phenomenon. In the autumn of 1946, a French priest named Jacques Benoit arrived in the Quebec border town of Lacolle via New York state. Benoit was actually Jacques Duge de Bernonville, a French war criminal who entered Canada with a forged passport.

Bernonville might have remained undetected had he not crossed paths in Granby with a Parisian Jew who had worked in the same building as he did before World War II.

Once Bernonville's real identity was revealed, the federal authorities detained him. Subsequently, a deportation order was issued. French Canadian nationalists, who had been sympathetic to Vichy France, rallied behind Bernonville, who eventually left Canada voluntarily.

Bernonville's story is told by Montreal historian Yves Lavertu in The Bernonville Affair (Robert Davies Publishing, $17.99). It is a timely book in light of the fact that the file on European war criminals in Canada is still wide open.

Born into an aristocratic family in 1897, Bernonville was an active member of Action Française, a fascist organization whose guru was the notorious ideologue Charles Maurras. In 1938, Bernonville was arrested, charged with trying to overthrow the government by force.

During the war, when France was occupied by Germany and governed by a collaborationist regime based in Vichy, he served as a functionary in the Commission for Jewish Questions. Its mandate was to implement anti-Semitic laws excluding Jews from the social, political and economic life of France and its overseas colonies.

Later, Bernonville served with the Milice, which rounded up Jews in France. In his final years as a collaborator, he was on the payroll of the 9th Brandenbourg regiment of the Waffen SS.

Like his fellow war criminal, Paul Touvier (who was sentenced to life imprisonment in 1994), Bernonville was accused of treason once the Germans were driven out of France. Catholic monasteries hid him, clergymen provided him with a plausible cover, while other Vichy supporters facilitated his flight to Spain and then to the United States and Canada.

As Lavertu observes, Quebec was partial to types like Bernonville. In 1940, the representative of Gen. Charles de Gaulle in Quebec, Elisabeth de Miribel, had bitterly commented: "French Canadians have boundless admiration for Marshal [Henri] Pétain, in spite of the people surrounding him, in spite of his mistakes. They consider any news that France is being enslaved by the Nazis to be the work of English propaganda."

Bernonville, therefore, blended in well in Quebec, and had he not been discovered by chance he may have escaped justice altogether. But as fate would have it, Bernonville's cover was blown.

Given the political climate in Quebec, the Bernonville case became a cause célèbre, taken up by such figures as the former mayor of Montreal, Camillien Houde, and a student leader named Camille Lauren, who, as a Parti Québécois cabinet minister, shepherded the passage of Bill 101 through the National Assembly.

The Jewish community monitored events, but rarely intervened in the open. Lavertu speculates that its attitude can be attributed in part to the fear of a public backlash.

In February 1950, almost a year after a judge in Quebec had declared Bernonville's deportation edict illegal, the Canadian government issued a new expulsion order. Prominent members of Quebec's elite protested, but to no avail. On Aug. 17, 1951, Bernonville left Canada for Brazil, a Nazi haven.

France requested his extradition, but it was an exercise in futility. Bernonville, the fugitive, lived out his years in Brazil. But in April 1972, his luck ran out. His cleaning lady's son, who was said to be under the influence of alcohol and drugs, murdered him in his apartment for no apparent reason.

The Bernonville Affair, resting on a foundation of primary archives and documents from such sources as the Canadian Jewish Congress and the Simon Wiesenthal Centre, opens up new vistas of understanding about Vichy France and French Canadian society. But, regrettably, it is not a first-class work, marred as it is by errors of omission and periodic bouts of wobbly writing.

The definitive book about Bernonville has yet to be written.

Man of letters

Alfred Kazin is a quintessential man of letters, an essayist, a memoirist and a literary critic. The son of a Russian Jewish blue-collar worker who settled in America in 1907, Kazin is best known for On Native Ground and A Walker in the City.

In his latest work, A Lifetime Burning In Every Moment (HarperCollins, $36.75), Kazin offers readers eclectic glimpses from the journals he has kept since the late 1930s. The book is wide-ranging and seldom less than interesting. Kazin recalls his youth in Brooklyn, his father's painful adjustment to a new land, his professional development as a writer, his friendships with New York intellectuals, his tempestuous marriages and his travels.

Kazin revels in irony. Shortly after the war, he visits a camp for displaced Jews in Germany. Then, in the company of the great musician Yehudi Menuhin, he attends a concert given by Wilhelm Furtwangler, Hitler's favorite conductor.

In a fragment, Kazin cannot resist the temptation of informing us that he saved The Origins of Totalitarianism from the dustbin. Having heard that a Boston publisher had rejected Hannah Arendt's brilliant manuscript, Kazin took it to the chief editor. After staying up all night digesting its contents, the editor accepted it with alacrity.

Kazin's impressions of Israel are enhanced by his ability to turn a deft phrase. One example will suffice: "Archeology here is Zionism with a shovel." His brief encounter with Yigael Yadin, the Israeli general and archeologist, is somewhat amusing. Yadin, bored, mechanically urges Kazin to make aliyah. When Kazin doesn't take the suggestion seriously, Yadin's guests display petulant vehemence. They can't understand that Kazin is rooted in American soil.

Kazin's pithy pen portraits are intriguing and acidic. In particular, I enjoyed his description of Bernard Berenson, the celebrated art critic; of Rabbi Leo Baeck, the leader of the Reform movement; and of the novelists Saul Bellow, Isaac Bashevis Singer and Jerzy Kosinski.

Shattered illusions

By CHAVA SHIMON

Guest Voices

I arrived and was shocked to find a dingy, dirty, chaotic city. All my illusions of a holy city, emanating light, were shattered by the harsh reality. I expected to find a Jewish city surrounded by Arab villages. Instead I found a Jewish street, sandwiched in the middle of an Arab city.

It was my first time visiting Hebron and the purpose of my spending Shabbat there was to try to clarify my political opinion on our second holy city. I must admit, I understand more now, but at the same time, I feel torn and confused when I consider my position on its fate, which is being decided now in a very dangerous game.

The tension was thick. As we walked through the streets and felt the icy glares, I was amazed by the irony. In the place where Jews and Arabs probably hate each other most, they live closest together.

Walking to pray at the Me'ara (The Cave of Machpelah), I was shocked to see a group of young Jewish boys throwing stones at an Arab kid on a bike. The twisted irony of this scene proved to me that we are definitely products of our environment.

As I walked up the stairs that lead up to the holy shrine, which we've seen endlessly on the news, chills ran down my spine. I stood in the place where Adam, Eve, Abraham, Sarah, Isaac, Rebecca, Jacob and Leah are buried. I can't say I was spiritually connected, but there was this intense identification with everying I've been doing, everything I've been learning. It was real.

As an observant and practising Jew, I feel a religious obligation towards the sanctity of the place. In Halachah we have a tremendous obligation towards k'vod hamet — respecting the dead. This halachic obligation teaches us about our past, and through understanding our past, we may better understand our present and our future. I asked myself if I would be willing to give away my parents' gravesite (may they live till 120).

At the same time, I was sad for the families who are committing their lives to preserve our sacred history. Every day for them is a struggle, is uncertain. Life there is so different: For Chanukah, children don't ask for the latest computer model, or a new bike, but to stay in Hebron with a strong Jewish community!

How many of us can say that we are committed to our roots, our heritage and the state of Israel to such an extent that our belief becomes the essence of our existence; that we live, breathe and fear it every day?

Then I thought, how many of us want our children to grow up playing in stones as opposed to playing on grass. I don't envision my children growing up this way and I don't wish it upon any child of Israel.

The air is filled with an enchanting holiness, and poisonous hatred.

Approaching Jerusalem on my way home, struggling with my ambivalent feelings, I tried to make sense of everything, but the one thing that kept coming back to my mind was the sight of the three young boys with their large kippot, picking up stones and throwing them at their adversary, the Arab kid their own age on a bike.

The challenge, of living in Hebron, is to live there with the strength of the Jewish people, with the Torah, rising above the ways of other nations, fighting with fiercer weapons. But what does this mean if our children are the ones who are casting stones?

Farewell to God, by Charles Templeton (McClelland & Stewart, $29.99).

"If there is a loving God, why does he permit — much less create — earthquakes, droughts, floods, tornadoes, and other natural disasters which kill thousands of innocent men, women and children every year?

"How can a loving, omnipotent God permit — much less create — encephalitis, cerebral palsy, brain cancer, leprosy, Alzheimer's, and other incurable illnesses to afflict millions of men, women and children, most of whom are decent people?

"How could a loving Heavenly Father create an endless Hell and, over the centuries, consign millions of people to it because they do not or cannot or will not accept certain religious beliefs?

"How can one believe the biblical account of the creation of the world in six days when every eminent physicist agrees that all living species have evolved over millions of years from primitive beginnings?

Probing questions

"Is it possible to believe that the Creator of the universe would personally impregnate a Palestinian virgin in order to facilitate getting his Son into the world as a man?"

These and other striking questions are posted by the author who was for more than 20 years a major figure in the church in Canada and the United States and a renowned evangelist who addressed mass rallies across North America.

Confronted by doubt about some of the major teachings of the Bible and the Christian faith, Charles Templeton in 1957, resigned from the ministry. Now almost 40 years later, he reveals the reasons for the abandonment of his faith.

He concedes that holy books of various religions contain gems of wisdom, profound insights, portraits of remarkable personalities as well as necessary laws to govern human behavior. "But they should be recognized for what they are — not the revealed word of a deity but the conclusions and insights of men and women who, across the centuries, have sought to understand and explain the mysteries of existence."

The author finds the God of the Hebrew scriptures an all too human deity with failings and passions on a grand scale...he is biased, querulous, vindictive and jealous of his prerogatives. Templeton is equally sceptical about the Christian church's insistence that Jesus was God, the second person of the Holy Trinity. He insists that he adheres strongly to the values that flow from Jesus' teachings, "without believing the unbelievable that this remarkable Palestinian teacher was Almighty God in the flesh."

Belief in the efficacy of prayer, he insists is a form of self-delusion. "Prayer cannot possibly change anything and there is no point to it." Can God be talked into running the universe according to the selfish wishes of a devout person? Try to imagine the chaos, he asks, if every person's prayer were answered. He concludes, "Our true prayers are the way we live."

He argues that Christians are a small minority in the world. Approximately four out of every five people on earth believe in gods other than the Christian God. "Are we to believe that only Christians are right?"

This apologia is bound to provoke controversy and outrage the sensibilities of many religious people. Complex and difficult theological questions are dealt with in a terse and superficial manner. There is no discussion of religion as a source of values and inspiration or of ritual and holiday observances as a means to add color, depth and meaning to life. Often repetitive and sometimes smug, this is nonetheless an honest, considered statement that people of faith should ponder in order to evaluate and assess their own religious convictions.

REACHING FOR A HIGH NOTE

Dance the horah on the Internet

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

Mention Israeli dance and images of children dancing a simple horah spring to mind. But there is much more to Israeli dance than Hevaynu Shalom Aleichem or Mayim Mayim. On the Jewish Highway, you can get a great education about the joy of dance in Jewish culture. All without working up a sweat!

The best overview of dance in Israel was prepared by the Ministry of Foreign Affairs [http://www.israel-mfa.gov.il/facts/ culture/fcult5.html]. This site traces the importance of dance in both communal and religious Jewish life. Nowadays, Israel boasts many impressive modern dance groups including the Bat-Dor and Batsheva Dance Companies and the remarkable Kol-Dmama (Sound-Silence) Dancers, a unique company comprised of deaf and hearing dancers.

The remainder of this site examines the evolution of folk dancing in Israel and analyzes its continued popularity. "While in other countries folk dance is fostered to preserve old rural traditions, in Israel it is a constantly developing art form."

When you come across Ernie Cohen's Israeli Folkdance Archive [http://superbook.bellcore.com/archive/homepage.html], you begin to understand how developed an art form it has become. Although this Web site's title page is deceptively simple, there is an incredible wealth of information here. You can search for almost any folk dance imaginable at [http://superbook.bellcore.com/archive/dances.html]. In return, you'll get the name of the choreographer, a list of recordings and videos that have been made of that dance. And for many of the songs, you will find the Hebrew lyrics transliterated into English and the dance step notation. You can browse the entire alphabetical list of hundreds of dances ranging from A Chassane to Zot Yerushalayim at [http://superbook.bellcore.com/israeli/choreographer/].

Another more modest page which is also looking for dance notes can be found at [http://www.artsci.wustl.edu/~jclerman/folkdance/dances.html].

It's one thing to try to teach yourself a dance step. But to really learn and enjoy, nothing beats the human touch. Here in Canada, you can find out more from Vancouver's Israeli Folk Dance Society [http://www.m-o-tek.com/nona/welcome.htm], in Montreal at [http://www.spherenet.com/keff/aboutus/aboutus.html] and in Toronto at [http://www.feduja.org/artculre/artcat.stm].

You never know whom you'll come across when you start looking for folk dancing fans. One of the more interesting (and eclectic) World Wide Web pages I came across belongs to an enthusiast of Israeli folk dancing, Ariel Cohen [http://shum.cc.huji.ac.il/~cariel/]. On his site, Cohen has links to articles about the threat of radon gas, a petition calling for the peaceful use of the Internet...and a page providing Israeli folk dance notation [http://shum.cc.huji.ac.il/~cariel/AggadatHasultan.html].

Oh yes, in addition to being a folk dancing fan, Cohen is also an expert in laser radars and Vice Mayor of Jerusalem.

If you believe that Israelis only dance folk music, here are a couple of sites that can set you straight. The Israel Tap Center [http://www.isratap.co.il/isratap.htm] has information about where to learn to tap dance and about the country's Jazz Tap Festivals. And for something completely different, why not try Martial Dance [http://www.io.org/~wwalker/mdance/Overview.html] which combines elements of dance improvisation, Aikido and Tai Chi.

But the most surprising Israeli dance site isn't found in Israel, North America or Europe but at Japan's Israeli Folkdance page [http://www.bekkoame.or.jp/~adontoru/english/eng.html].

According to this fascinating site, Israeli folk dancing made its way to Japan after World War II. Teachers from the United States. (who were neither Jewish nor Israeli) began to teach these dances in Japanese junior high schools and apparently their popularity continues to today. And what's the most popular dance of them all? Mayim Mayim.

Happy dancing!

JNF honors Jackman at Negev Dinner

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — More than 800 people attended the recent 48th annual Jewish National Fund (JNF) of Toronto Negev Dinner honoring Lt. Gov. Henry Jackman.

The evening featured political bantering and tributes to the honoree by politicians, clergy, Israeli representatives and community leaders.

Following the introduction of the head table guests by Ben Prossin, executive director of JNF Toronto, former Liberal prime minister John Turner, who served as dinner chair, lauded Jackman as someone who believes in "a sense of duty, a sense of responsibility, a duty to give something back for what he and the rest of us have received from a marvellous country."

Praising Jackman for serving Ontario "for all the right reasons," Turner said everyone in the province "owes him an immense amount of gratitude and respect for what he has done."

Jehudi Kinar, Israeli consul general to Ontario and Western Canada, said the proceeds of this year's dinner will establish the Jackman Gardens in the JNF Park Jerusalem 3000.

Chanukah candles were lit by Bill Lampert and Barry Spiegel, co-chairs of the General Canvass Division, assisted by youngsters Tara Disenhouse, Jessica and Jeffery Fryman, Kathy Sager and Allan Ungar.

U of T's next chancellor

Former Ontario premier Bob Rae said he paid tribute to Jackman "despite the fact that a year and a half ago, you fired me."

In an unscheduled announcement, Rose Wolfe, chancellor of the University of Toronto, said that Jackman has been elected as the university's next chancellor.

Joey Tanenbaum, the 1994 Negev Dinner honoree, lauded Jackman, whom he said has often talked of the similarities between the struggle for nationhood by the people of Israel and those in Canada.

In his response, Jackman chided Rae: "We worked out an agreement; we decided how to divide up the responsibilities. I said I will take all the honors and you will take all the blame, Bob. I think it worked out pretty well."

As his last official public function as Ontario's lieutenant governor (Jackman officially completed his term of office three days after the dinner), he said, "If I had to pick one dinner at which I could thank Canadians for their generosity, for their dedication to the principals we all hold dear, I can not think of a better place than here at the Negev Dinner."

Dinner co-chairs were Rae, Alan Posluns and Prof. Irving Abella.

Young Jewish Adults group shuts down in T.O.

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The Association for Young Jewish Adults (AYJA) has closed down here after seven years in operation, although it's still going strong in Montreal, where it originated in 1987.

Both in Montreal and Ottawa, where a branch was organized three years ago, the group is now affiliated with the local Jewish community centre (Snowdon Y and Ottawa JCC respectively).

The association, known for its fundraising social activities, began life as the Jewish Adult Programming Society (JAPS) in Montreal, but eventually changed its name because of flak over the acronym.

"We saw a need in the community for singles to meet, and for fundraising," said Rob Singer, who co-founded the group with David Hershon. "Every dollar we raised we donated back to the community," he added. Singer, now 34, owns the Jewish Singles Registry in Toronto.

These days, at least in Toronto, 20- and 30-somethings have a wider variety of Jewish outlets in which to become involved. It was becoming hard to compete with for-profit organizations who ran the same types of activities, said past president Marla Cohen.

An additional factor in the decision to shut down was the difficulty finding new volunteers to organize the programs, Cohen added. A core group was actively involved in programming; their mailing list at one point had some 1,500 names.

"Good way of meeting people"

When Cohen, now 30, moved from Montreal to Toronto in 1990, she became involved with AYJA immediately. "I thought it was a good cause and a good way of meeting people."

Although the association used to hold parties in Toronto every six to eight weeks, it's been over a year since their last one.

AYJA leaders, faced with time constraints and changing lifestyles (Cohen, for example, is a new mother), were hoping to find people to take over their reponsibilities. According to de facto national president Mike Cohen (no relation to Marla), the organization would welcome inquiries even now from anyone interested in revitalizing the group.

Over the years, in the three cities, AYJA raised between $100,000 and $150,000 for charities such as Magen David Adom, the Reena Foundation, United Jewish Appeal as well as lesser known ones. A few years ago they held a step aerobathon to raise money for the Crohn's and Colitis Foundation of Canada. Often they would donate needed items such as mezuzahs or books, said Marla Cohen.

"I feel good about what AYJA has done," she added.

Mike Cohen, the de facto national president, is a 34-year-old Montrealer who has been involved with AYJA since its inception.

"It was probably one of the greatest things in my life. It brought me into a network of young Jewish adults – probably all the best friends I have today are people I met through that group," he said. Cohen, national director of communications for Canadian Jewish Congress, served as AYJA president for three years.

A major event is being planned in Montreal for the group's 10th anniversary, he said. "We estimate 50 to 100 couples met and married through AYJA. It's absolutely incredible. Our group is different because it's singles and couples."

For more information about the June 1997 reunion, call Davina Shapiro at the Snowdon Y, 514-737-6551.

Young Judaea to celebrate 80th anniversary

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Canadian Young Judaea (CYJ) is embarking on a year of celebration to mark its 80th anniversary.

Among the planned commemorative events are reunions to be held across the country next fall. The Zionist youth movement, which was started by Canadian youth in 1917, is probably best known for its summer camp,started by CYJ teens who wanted to continue their year-round activities during the summer, said the organization's executive director Risa Epstein.

Canadian Young Judaea has a presence in Vancouver, Edmonton, Toronto, Montreal and Halifax, and has been coordinating Jewish weekends recently for children and adults in a number of eastern Canadian cities, in cooperation with the Atlantic Jewish Council.

For Ryan Hass, CYJ's national shaliach, the appeal of the organization lies in its "total acceptance and tolerance." A 29-year-old native of Southend-on-Sea, England who made aliyah in 1989, Hass was involved in CYJ affiliate Hanoar Hatzioni from the age of 8.

"You could be sitting in a room doing a program with someone who wears a kippah and someone who doesn't, with someone who believes in the left wing and someone who believes in the right wing. It seems to bring these people together...and creates a Jewish environment and Jewish identity," said Hass.

Although he grew up in a religious home and attended cheder in a community of 1,500 Jewish families, the youth movement gave him "another side to the Jewish identity."

Epstein, a former Young Judaean who has lived in Israel, confirms Hass' description of the diversity within the youth movement. "We have kids who are shomer shabbos and kids who have very little Jewish tradition in their homes. We're able to satisfy both their needs in an environment of respect."

A graduate of the Hebrew University of Jerusalem whose undergraduate degree was in informal education, Hass lists among his main goals co-ordinating the educational aspect of CYJ and fostering leadership.

Before arriving here in October, he spent three years in charge of Hanoar Hatzioni's European and Canadian desk.

Hass is the director of Camp Solelim, a six-week leadership camp near Sudbury, Ontario for 14- and 15-year-olds, and is also affiliated with CYJ's other summer camps: Kinneret and Biluim Canada, both in the Laurentians; Camp Kadimah in Nova Scotia; Camp Hatikvah in British Columbia; Biluim Israel, one of the largest Canadian teen trips to Israel; and Camp Shalom in Gravenhurst, Ontario, whose establishment in 1948 was marked in a commemorative issue of The Judaean that also saluted the new republic of Israel.

In Toronto there is a junior program during the year for youngsters age 7 to 13 and for teens. The programs had fizzled during the 1980s, but there's been "a rebirth," noted Epstein. "People in the community are looking for an informal way for their children to learn about Judaism." Vancouver and Edmonton have followed a similar trend, she added.

The concomitant educational aspect does not include "using the youth movement as a political vehicle," Hass emphasized.

"We believe," said Epstein, "that education is the only way our campers can make educated decisions about their own beliefs."

TVO program to focus on historic cemetery

TORONTO — A documentary aired on TVO's Studio 2 in October will be repeated on Dec. 27 between 8 and 9 p.m. due to popular demand.

Studio 2 co-host Steve Paikin travelled north to a bleak area near Kirkland Lake to visit an old Jewish cemetery there, in a place once known as Krugerdorff.

The documentary covers a little-known piece of Ontario social history, when immigrant Jewish pioneers applied their skills to the building of the Ontario Northern railway line, settled in and around Kirland Lake. There were two shuls to serve the close-knit community, and a family named Hederofsky donated part of its land for use as a cemetery.

Now only a handful of Jews remain in the area and there is no synagogue to serve them.

Rae praises Lenkinski for human rights work

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The late Jewish labor activist Louis Lenkinski was an "essential" figure in events that led to the laws banning discrimination in employment and housing in Ontario, former Ontario premier Bob Rae said recently.

"I learned to like and to love him," said Rae, who delivered the first annual lecture in Lenkinski's memory to about 250 people at Leah Posluns Theatre.

Lenkinski and the Jewish Labor Committee played a major role in convincing the late premier Leslie Frost to pass the laws, Rae said

The lecture was delivered in the glow of candles celebrating the sixth night of Chanukah lit by Lenkinski's two sons, Robert and Lionel, and Bernie Farber of the Canadian Jewish Congress. Lenkinski's widow, Helen, was also present.

"Toronto is a smaller place and we are all diminished by his demise," said chair Rabbi Jordan Pearlson of the feisty labor leader who died at the age of 74 while vice-chair of the Ontario Human Rights Commission.

Rae said there would be no question period following his address in tribute to Lenkinski because "no one could ask a question buried in a statement as well as he could."

One of Lenkinski's strengths was that he did not accept the view that human rights was an individual matter but insisted that it belonged to all groups like the blacks, Jews and Chinese, Rae said.

CJC officer Ellen Cole introduced the former premier on behalf of Ontario region chair Moshe Ronen.

Kosher wines pass taste test

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to the CJN

TORONTO — Dick Singer, freelance wine writer, swirls the liquid in his wine glass and sniffs the bouquet. "It's excellent," he declares, and then sips. "It's balanced, with a very judicial use of wood, and good clean fruit coming through."

That was Gamla, a kosher chardonnay wine from Israel. Next he tries a glass of Bartenura Peimonte, a kosher chardonnay from Italy. "A soft dry, right? But it's not completely dry. It's got more viscosity, more body, and probably more alcohol, too."

At a recent kosher wine-tasting at the Wagman Centre in North York, a crowd of oenophiles, restaurateurs, caterers, writers and other guests sampled dozens of kosher wines provided by the event's two sponsors, Herzog Wines of Brooklyn, N.Y., and Mazel Wines of 3825 Bathurst St., Toronto.

"We're trying to promote the new world of kosher wines," said Nathan Herzog, vice-president of Herzog Wines. "We're trying to show that kosher today is not sweet. It's not an old-fashioned wine. It can be a first-rate bordeaux or an awarding-winning cabernet sauvignon from California."

Dozens of kosher wines were uncorked at the tasting. The most expensive was Chateau Labegorge Margaux, an exclusive bordeaux that sells for about $75 a bottle. Others, which sell at more popular prices, included several varieties of Kedem wines from New York State, Baron Herzog wines from California, Bartenura wines from Italy, Herzog Select wines from France and Gamla wines from Israel.

The company's most popular label is Baron Herzog, which typically sells for $9 to $16 a bottle in Canada. One table displayed at least a dozen varieties of kosher wine available at a number of Liquor Control Board of Ontario outlets. Many other labels that the LCBO doesn't carry are available through the company's exclusive agent, Mazel Wines (416-631-8071).

Maurice Benzacar, vice-president of the Canadian Sephardic Federation, recalled the wide variety of kosher wines his family had grown accustomed to in his native Morocco. "Then we came to this country, and you couldn't find a bottle of kosher wine anywhere, except for sweet Manischewitz," he said.

He sipped the wine he was holding, a Merlot red from France. "We've come a long way," he said. "The city used to be a desert."

Joe Elmaleh, restaurateur of the North York kosher restaurant King Solomon's Table, concurred. "It's really amazing how many kosher wines are now available," he said.

Holiness the purpose of education: rabbi

By LEILA SPEISMAN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The purpose of Jewish education is to teach a child to do that for which he was created —to be holy, says Rabbi Avraham Kelman.

But only when he understands what makes G-d holy, can he understand what true holiness is, the former Torontonian and now a prominent New York rabbi, said at a lecture at Beth Jacob synagogue to mark the yahrzeit of Chaim (Harry) Friedman, grandfather of Rabbi Jay Kelman, the shul's associate rabbi.

If that purpose is not accomplished, the rabbi said, "life is meaningless."

When Mordechai was trying to convince Queen Esther to go to Ahashverus to try to save the Jews of Shushan, the rabbi said, he used three arguments. The first two were ineffectual: If you don't go, then someone else will, and if you don't go, you and your family will die.

The third argument, that perhaps that situation was the reason Esther became Queen, worked, because it emphasized the belief in purpose so important to Jewish thought.

Holiness, Rabbi Kelman said, "is the ability to live a life in which self-preservation and self-aggrandisement are not the primary function in life.

"What it is, is creating and maintaining the world for others."

'Chodesh makes us aware of wonders of time, nature'

The Syrian Greeks, at the time of the first Chanukah, were "totally devoted to self-preservation," not only in their search for physical perfection and the satisfaction of individual desires, but even in their study of the natural world.

"Science and math enabled them to understand this world, and make better use of it for themselves. There was no holiness in it."

The Greeks knew what they were doing when they forbade the Jews to mark the new month, and perform circumcision.

"Chodesh, the marking of the new moon, makes us aware of the wonders and accuracy of time, and of nature. It's purpose is to make us recognize how miraculous is the world that G-d has created."

The bris, he went on, makes Jews realize that while the creation of a person is indeed miraculous, that creation must be controlled and elevated.

Chaim Friedman was honored by a ceremony marking the conclusion of the study of a portion of Talmud in his memory, by grandson Yaakov Friedman.

Rabbi Kelman was introduced by Rabbi Jay Kelman, also a grandson, and thanked by Rabbi Moshe Burak, spiritual leader of Beth Jacob Congregation.

The synagogue has begun a special lecture program to mark the 100th anniversary of its founding. The next lecture is Jan. 4. Guest speaker will be Dr. Eddy Breuer, who will speak on Orthodoxy Confronts Modernity: A Variety of Traditional Responses.

Prof. says religion and democracy can coexist

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Special to the CJN

TORONTO – Jewish statehood is a challenge to all Jews, whether secular or religious, says a law professor at Jerusalem's Hebrew University.

"There are tremendous clashes between proponents of the democratic notion and those who believe in the notion of divine law," said Izhak Englard, who spoke recently on Can a Jewish State be a Democratic State?, co-presented by the University of Toronto's Jewish Studies Program and the Dr. Max and Gianna Glassman Exchange Program.

A number of models have been suggested that attempt to deal with the problem, Englard said.

"One model is to conceive the notion of the Jewish state in the cultural and Zionist sense — a secular, nationalist identity. Ideologists who conceived this model believe that we start with democracy and add some Jewishness, only if it does not detract from the former. Full precedence is given to democracy."

On the other hand, the Orthodox believe in "the divine providence of the Jewish people. Orthodoxy cannot accept the notion of tolerance. They feel that if one is left alone to commit sins, those sins will affect the public. The notion of mutual responsibility and the danger of individual sin is one of the greatest fears of Orthodox people," he said.

Englard, the Bora Laskin professor of law at Hebrew University, said that proponents of a modern state worry about the physical welfare of the people and not their moral virtues.

"Again, this clash of notions creates a dilemma for Orthodox Jews. Modern scholars have found a definite anti-political stance in rabbinic Judaism. There are claims that the Orthodox community discredits earthly political power."

The bottom line, said Englard, is that "human existence is fraught with contradictions and nothing can be resolved by denying the validity of one's values. What we must do, is strive for harmony between irreconcilable elements. Rabbinic Judaism must cope with the idea of a modern state and secular circles must cope with the aspirations of the Orthodox."

YIDDISH CORNER

רעדאגירט פון ש. ליפשיץ

גיב אַ שמייכל

פון הערשל פֿאַליאַנקער

(ייִדישע פֿאַלקס-ווערטלעך)

פֿאַלן פֿאַלט דער מענטש אַליין, אַבער כדי זיך אויפֿ-הייבן, נויטיקט ער זיך אין דער האַנט פון אַ גוטן פֿרייַנד.

איין האָר פון אַ מיידלס קאָפּ שלעפּט שטאַרקער, ווי צען אָקסן.

אַ וואָרעם קריכט אַריין אין כריין און מיינט, אַז קיין זיסערע זאַך דערפון איז אויף דער וועלט נישטאָ.

אַ גאָלדענע נשמה — ער האָט נאָך נישט באַווין טאַן אַ מענטשן גוטס, ווי ער האָט שוין חרטה.

די מורד איז אַזוי פויל, אַז זי האָט זיך אַפילו געפּוילט חתונה האָבן.

דער גליקלעכסטער מענטש אויף דער ערד איז געווען אָדם הראשון: ער האָט נישט געהאַט קיין שוויגער.

קליינע קינדער לאָזן נישט שלאָפן, גרויסע קינדער לאָזן נישט לעבן.

זאָלסט קיינעם נישט מקנא זיין — קנאה עסט אויף פּודווייז געזונט.

איין פֿאַסער קען האָדעווען צען קינדער, צען קינדער קענען נישט אויסהאַלטן איין פֿאַסער.

אַן אייזל דערקענט מען לויט די אויערן. אַ נאַר — לויט דער לאַנגער צונג.

אַז גאָט וויל שטראָפן אַ מענטשן, נעמט ער בי אים אָפּ דעם שכל.

אַ קינד איז אַמאָל ערגער פון אַ גזלן, און מען מח נאָך טאַנצן אויף זיין חתונה.

— יונגערמאַן, וואָס שרייט איר אַזוי שטאַרק, וואָס רייסט איר איין וועלטן, מען זעט דען נישט גליק, סאַראַ פֿאַסקודניאַק איר זייט?

דער מענטש טראַכט, און דער מלאך המות לאַכט.

איך וואָלט אַ בעלן געווען האָבן אַ וויב, ווי די לבנה: ביינאַכט זאָל זי אויפגיין, און גאַנץ פרי זאָל זי ניט ווערן.

די פרוי איז שיין, מילד, רייצנדיק, כל זמן זי עפּנט נישט דאָס מויל.

באַשע האָט איבערגעלייגט אַ ים מיט ליבע-ראַמאַנען, טויזנט מאָל זיך באַגאָסן מיט ביטערע טרערן, און אַליין גע-בליבן אַן אַלטע מוידז.

אַ זיגער איז בעסער, ווי גלעט. גלעט צעגייט זיך און אַ זיגער שטעלט זיך אָפּ.

נישט שטענדיק איז אַן אָפּטימיסט יענער, וואָס האָט די גאַנצע צייט אַ שמייכל אויפן פנים. צייטנווייז איז דאָס פשוט אַ נאַר.

אַ גוטע דערציילונג דאַרף זיין קורץ, אַ שלעכטע — נאָך קירצער.

היט אָפּ אייער געזונט. איר קריגט פֿס נישט אין קראָם פֿאַר קיין שום געלט.

קלוגע מענטשן וויסן גוט, וואָס אַזוינס איז נאָרישקייט, דאָך באַנאָרישן זיי זיך גאַנץ אָפט.

אַז אַ נאַר וואַרפט אַריין אַ שטיין אין גאָרטן, וועלן אים קיין צען חכמים נישט געפּינען.

גלייכער מיט אַ קלוגן פֿאַרלירן, איידער מיט אַ נאַר געווינען.

נאָראָנים דאַרף מען נישט זיין, זיי וואָקסן אַליין, ווי קראָפּעווע.

אַ זעעוודיקער קען אויך זיין בלינד.

צווישן אַלע מעלות וואָס אַ מענטש פֿארמאָגט, איז אַבער די בעסטע מעלה — אַ מענטש זאָל מען זיין.

אויף וועמענס וואָגן מען פֿאָרט, אַזאַ ניגון זינגט מען.

די צייט איז דער בעסטער דאָקטאָר.

איר פרעגט, וואָס עס האָט דערפון? קדחות אין אַ קליין טעפּעלע.

איר פרעגט, וואָס עס האָט פֿאַר דעם באַקומען? אַכצן און דרייצן, דאָס איבעריקע מינץ.

די צייט מאַכט דעם מענטשן גרוי און אַלט.

היט זיך, מענטש, פון גראָפֿמאַנען און טויגעניכטסן. זיי זיינען פּייאיק אויף אַלץ.

דער פֿאַרשווין האָט זיך באַרואיקט: מען האָט אים אַפּגענאָמען מיט אַ קאָלטן עמער וואַסער.

Diplomat linked to drug smuggling ring

Staff and Wire Services

OTTAWA — Officials here are tight-lipped about a Canadian diplomat allegedly linked to a cocaine smuggling ring in Israel.

Authorities in Canada say Douglas Wardle, who was recalled from Israel three weeks ago, is under investigation by the RCMP for "possible criminal activity."

Foreign Affairs spokesperson Charles Larabie refused to confirm Israeli media reports that Wardle, an administrative officer at Canada's embassy in Tel Aviv, used his diplomatic immunity to take part in a cocaine smuggling operation worth millions of dollars.

Larabie told The CJN that Wardle, a 20-year diplomatic corps veteran who had been with the embassy since 1994, has been suspended with pay pending the investigation.

Ottawa recalled the mid-level diplomat Nov. 29, just after the Israeli Foreign Ministry presented Canadian ambassador David Berger with the police evidence against Wardle.

According to widespread Israeli reports, that evidence included smuggling cocaine inside a diplomatic pouch, which is immune from customs and inspection, and helping to finance drug shipments.

However, according to Larabie, there is "no indication" that Wardle's use of a diplomatic pouch to smuggle drugs are part of the allegations.

Israeli police began to suspect Wardle after a raid on the home of an alleged Israeli accomplice netted between six and eight kilos of Colombian cocaine

Israeli police were quoted as saying the drugs were purchased in the United States and brought to Israel by Wardle through "diplomatic mail."

Police are still investigating whether other employees of the Canadian Embassy were involved in the operation.

The daily Yediot Aharonot reported that a member of Canada's UN force in Israel was also arrested, but that was denied by both the police and the Canadian Embassy.

So far, two Israelis, Meir Hazan, 37, of Beersheva, and Ya'acov Sternheim, 46, of Yavne, have been arrested in the case.

But Tel Aviv detectives are searching for a third Israeli believed to be the leader of the drug gang. The man, reportedly a friend of Wardle's, has apparently fled the country.

Hazan was arrested Nov. 21. He was remanded in custody for eight more days by Tel Aviv Magistrate's Court last week, following the discovery of the Colombian cocaine in a suitcase.

Sternheim is believed to have established contact with Wardle about six months ago in a Tel Aviv pub where the two hung out, according to Ha'aretz.

The Canadian Embassy has refused to comment on the case.

Reportedly, Wardle has kept his diplomatic immunity and thus cannot be tried in Israel without the Canadian government's permission. The RCMP is treating the incident as though it took place on Canadian soil.

Students' experiments head into space

By JANICE ARNOLD
CJN Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — When the Atlantis space shuttle blasts off from the Kennedy Space Centre in Florida next May, a group of Herzliah High School (Snowdon) students will be watching with special interest.

On board will be two tiny test tubes of the students' containing barium chloride and sodium sulfate, which when mixed together on Earth produce barium sulfate, the chalky solution given to patients before an X-ray of their digestive tract.

The students want to find out if these two compounds will produce the same sort of "milkshake" in low gravity, that is, be drinkable and coat the stomach and intestines opaquely, in order that they show up in contrast on an X-ray.

Herzliah is one of 12 elementary and secondary schools in Canada (one of seven in Quebec) whose experiment was selected by the Canadian Space Agency from among 53 proposals for inclusion in the student segment of the Canadian Protein Crystallization Experiment (CAPE) project, aboard the Russian space station Mir.

The student experiments will be brought by Atlantis to Mir, which is circling the Earth at an altitude of approximately 390 kilometres.

"This is an opportunity for hands-on learning; it's not like just learning something from a textbooks," said Munk.

After travelling over 100 million km through space at speeds of more than 27,000 km an hour, the experiments will be returned to Earth sometime in September and sent back to the classrooms of the students who designed them for analysis.

The student experiments will be conducted alongside those of some of Canada's top scientists. Researchers from a dozen universities and institutes will use Mir to grow protein crystals in microgravity.

All of the experiments will be housed in an automated laboratory about the size of a large shoebox, that will mix the liquids in pairs of tiny test tubes, or wells (each holds 125 microlitres), at precisely timed intervals. About 40 of the 800 wells in the device will be made available to the winning students.

The student experiments will remain unopened until they are returned to Earth.

Jewish war orphans' story told

By ADAM KORBIN
Special to The CJN

VANCOUVER — It was appropriate that the launch for Fraidie Martz' book Open Your Hearts, the story of Jewish war orphans in Canada, was held in Vancouver.

Just as the war orphans travelled from Montreal to Vancouver 50 years ago, Martz' research for the book also began in Montreal and ended in Vancouver, where she now lives.

Open Your Hearts tells of 1,123 Jewish war orphans who survived the Holocaust and were reluctantly allowed into Canada. The story, which is drawn from archival material, diaries and interviews, is not only about the orphans who each had a miraculous story of survival to tell, but also about the Canadian families that took them in. Many families were told they'd have the orphans for a weekend or a week at most. In fact, many orphans became permanent family members.

At one point during her remarks at the book launch, Martz asked the former orphans in the audience to identify themselves. Three men put up their hands: David Ehrlich, Leo Lowy and Robbie Waisman. Then she asked if there were any members of families that took in orphans and five women raised their hands and the event quickly turned into a mini-reunion.

Waisman said there were few women who had survived the Holocaust, and even fewer on board their ship bound for Canada.

"Our spirits were lifted when we were told we would be meeting some nice Jewish girls in Winnipeg!" he said.

The launch, held at the Holocaust Centre, was co-sponsored by the Holocaust Education Centre, the Jewish Historical Society, the Jewish Community Centre and the Isaac Waldman Jewish Public Library. The book was published by Véhicule Press.

VANCOUVER — Teaching about the Holocaust should be mandated and incorporated into the curriculum early in a child's education, Canadian Jewish Congress, Pacific region, recently said in a proposal to Paul Pallen, British Columbia's assistant minister of education skills and training.

Congress "would like to see lessons learned from the Holocaust included in the core curriculum. At present, Holocaust studies are optional and a student can complete 12th grade without even hearing the word mentioned. The lessons of the Holocaust are too important to be optional," said regional officer Felicia Folk.

Holocaust education days are held on an ad hoc basis in B.C. schools, mainly in the Vancouver and Victoria areas. They are conducted by Congress staff with help from survivors.

Folk told Pallen the lessons of the Holocaust provide students with the tools needed to deal with living in a complex, pluralistic society.

"These lessons," she said, "can be incorporated within existing subjects to encourage students to think critically and to counter the devices which foster prejudice and discriminatory behavior — sometimes leading to violence in our society."

She pointed out that Toronto, North York and New Brunswick have included the study of the Holocaust in their schools' curricula "in recognition that the societal and human conditions which precipitated the Holocaust are present in contemporary society."

CJC executive director Erwin Nest and associate director Marilyn Berger called the discussions "very productive."

School's closing angers parents

By MYRON LOVE
CJN Prairie Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Many North Winnipeg Jewish parents are angry and disillusioned with the Winnipeg Board of Jewish Education's (BJE) decision to close the Talmud Torah-I.L.Peretz School (TTILP) as of the end of June.

The final decision came in October, when efforts collapsed to have at least a junior kindergarten to Grade 4 program at the Rosh Pina Synagogue.

In a letter to the BJE, Talmud Torah parent council co-chairs Sharon Chisvin and Nancy Glinter expressed the betrayal felt by many parents.

"We don't believe there was ever a real commitment on behalf of the BJE to maintain a north-end school," they wrote. "It was only at the urging of our school committee that the BJE reluctantly agreed to form a committee to look into an alternate site for our school."

Last winter, the parents were informed that the BJE was moving to a "middle years" concept, in which Grade 5, 6, 7 and 8 students would be in the same school. (This is a trend in school divisions around the province.) Their school would be left with JK-Grade 4.

Recently, however, BJE President Dr. Eric Winograd and superintendent Jack Solomon met with the parents and said that the board was only willing to leave a Junior Kindergarten and Kindergarten class and a combined Grade 1 and 2 group in the north end.

Parents were given two weeks to decide if they wanted to leave their children in the program. Most of the Grade 1 and 2 parents pulled out.

In their letter, Glinter and Chisvin expressed their disappointment that newly appointed superintendent Solomon had not "bothered to walk through the Rosh Pina and see its potential until the day before the parent meeting." Nor did he even have any plans ready as to how the BJE intended to proceed with the JK and K program or to provide a shuttlebus service to take north-end children to campus.

"We particularly decry the lack of openness," Glinter and Chisvin wrote. "It is not the decision, as much as the demeanor of the Board. The message we have received is that dialogue is irrelevant and our children are unimportant. This has been a sad affair for the entire Jewish community. Many in the north end (which still account for about 40 percent of the Jewish population – although three-quarters of young families live in the south end) have lost trust in the community leadership."

Nevertheless, Glinter and Chisvin say that they are prepared to continue to try working within the system to inculcate the values of community and Yiddishkeit that made the TTILP what it was.

St. John loses two Jewish leaders

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO —The Jewish community of Saint John, N.B., lost two of its leading citizens in the same week recently.

They were Rose Freedman, 92, the oldest member of the community, and Lou Michelson, 77, who has been the lay spiritual leader for the community for the past 14 years. Saint John has been without a rabbi for that time.

Feedman was born in Hillsborough, N.B., in 1904, daughter of the late Isaac and Bessie Selick.

She was known as a "professional volunteer." Her commitment to the Saint John Jewish community was a deep one involving her activity in all its organizations.

She organized a shelter for immigrant families arriving in Saint John after World War II.

She is survived by two sons, Dr. Lewis Freedman and Berard Freedman, two daughters, Marcia Kovan and Edythe Steinberg, as well as 12 grandchildren and 23 great-grandchildren.

Michelson worked for many years as a film distributor in Saint John for many of the major film companies. In the early 1960s he became co-owner of Saint John's first drive-in restaurant, the Dog-N-Suds. He later sold restaurant supplies for Chan food products.

Someone in the community must learn to take over his father's role as spiritual leader, said his son, Dr. Alan Michelson of Waban, Mass., near Boston, who came for the funeral and the shivah.

Alan Michelson said his father led by example. "I relied on his advice," he said. "I rarely made an important decision without him."

His father was treasurer of Shaarei Zedek Synagogue and previously was president for three years.

He is survived by his wife, Jen (Kashetsky) Michelson, son, Aton, two grandchildren, Aviel and Ariane, and a sister, Ida Shuman of Dundas, Ont.

Canada Israel free trade law passes the Senate

Enter into the picture the fact that Ronald MacDonald, a Nova Scotia Liberal MP who had never been to the Middle East in his life, was sent on a 17-day whirlwind trip to Israel, Muscat, Oman, Abu Dhabi, Dubai, Jordan, and to the cities of Aman, Ramallah, Gaza City, Hebron, Kuwait City and Tel Aviv.

MacDonald was sent to find out what the Arabs and Palestinians thought about CIFTA. He was picked in part because he held no preconceived view for or against anybody in the Middle East, and could approach the issue with an open mind.

He reported back to the Senate last week that after talking to a number of Arab and Palestinian leaders, he believes there is no way that any good can come from holding up the trade agreement.

He admitted that he too had considered at one point holding up the deal to send Israel a message.

He explained that when Yitzak Rabin first proposed the deal, "it was a time of great hope for peace," but by the time an agreement was reached last summer, the government in Israel had changed.

MacDonald made it clear that Netanyahu may not have been Canada's first choice, but he was, after all, Israel's choice.

"Even though sometimes we do not like the results of democracy, we must accept that democracy is the way to go," he told the Senate Foreign Affairs committee.

Surprisingly, he admitted that there had been "considerable debate" within the Liberal cabinet about whether Canada should "hoist" the trade deal so as to "lever" Netanyahu "to put the peace process back on track."

In the end, the government decided delaying implementation of the trade pact might not have the desired effect, and it certainly wouldn't help Canadian business, he said.

There would be no question of rewarding or punishing anyone.

MacDonald spent three days in the Gaza, where he met Mahel Masri, the Palestinian minister of economy and trade, and Dr. Nabeel Shath, minister of planning and international cooperation. He also met several senior economic and business advisors to Yasser Arafat.

He discovered that the Palestinians are not opposed at all to CIFTA, because they hope it will allow them to trade with the outside world, something they said Israel prevents them from doing by closing borders, blocking their produce from entering Israel, or even going to other parts of the occupied territories.

Israel is paying a heavy price for the stalled peace talks, he said. When the free trade talks began, the Israeli economy was growing at five and six per cent. It was the fastest growing economy outside Asia. This year it has slowed down to one or two percent and last month actually went backwards one per cent.

MacDonald said only prosperity will bring peace.

"The poor people and the children with hollow cheeks who are sitting in camps in Gaza could not care less about what we are doing." he said.

Halifax seniors celebrate Chanukah

By JOEL JACOBSON
CJN Atlantic Correspondent

HALIFAX — The latkes were hot, the challah was fresh and the candles glowed as brightly as the faces of the 11 Jewish residents of Northwood Manor, a Halifax senior citizens residence that hosted its first-ever Chanukah party this year.

Northwood's management and the Atlantic Jewish Council are working together to establish a special wing for Jewish seniors at the manor.

This party was organized, said Gael Phillips, director of clinical services, "because Christmas is a happy time for most of our people. Chanukah should be happy for our Jewish residents."

While the majority of the manor's population is Christian, Jews make up the second largest percentage, said Susasn Dempsey, senior director of dietetic services. She and her assistant Charles Kwan organized the day with help from Isabelle Vardon and Shirley Burnstein, also staffers at Northwood.

"We've had monthly Sabbath dinners for the Jewish residents but this is the first time we've done a Chanukah celebration," said Dempsey. "Charles got Shirley's latke recipe and then found a recipe for challah which was specially made by an outside baker."

Rabbi Saul Aronov of Beth Israel Synagogue lit the Chanukah candles and said the blessing on the wine. Resident Howard Polar, a man in his late 80s who regularly attends daily services at the synagogue and reads the Monday and Thursday Torah portions, said the Hamotzi.

Most of the residents and a few special guests participated when Rabbi Aronov led a sing-song of Chanukah melodies in Hebrew, Yiddish and English.

Israel firm on financing settlement expansion

By NAOMI SEGAL
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — Israeli government officials have defended a cabinet decision to give special tax breaks and other financial benefits to Jewish settlements in the West Bank.

The officials also dismissed Palestinian warnings of renewed confrontations over the issue.

"We are not seeking a confrontation with the Palestinians," said Defence Minister Yitzhak Mordechai, who met Sunday with Jewish settlement leaders.

"We are aware of the threats, but they will not deter us," he added. "We have said again and again that the settlements in Judea, Samaria and Gaza are deserving of support."

Mordechai's comments came in the wake of last Friday's cabinet decision to grant level "A" status to the Jewish settlements, the same status accorded development towns and border communities.

The status will provide settlements with a series of financial benefits, including subsidies for housing, education and investments.

Such subsidies had been discontinued by the previous Labor government.

The Netanyahu cabinet decision not only drew criticism from the Palestinian leadership, but also from the United States and the European Union, which said Israel's government was adding more friction to already-tense Israeli-Palestinian relations.

Mordechai dismissed Palestinian Authority leader Yasser Arafat's criticism over the weekend of the cabinet decision as a "declaration of war" by Israel.

"I think it is clear to everybody," Mordechai told reporters. "We'd like to continue the peace process with the Palestinians."

The cabinet move came in response to the recent terrorist attack on a car carrying an Israeli family near Beit El, a settlement near the West Bank Palestinian town of Ramallah.

The Popular Front for the Liberation of Palestine claimed responsibility for the attack, after which the perpetrators fled to Ramallah.

Palestinian officials complained Sunday that Israel had tightened the closure it had imposed on the Ramallah area in the wake of the shooting.

Israel closed off secondary roads and dirt roads leading from the self-rule enclave. Sunday's move came in the wake of reports that Palestinians were using them to avoid Israeli roadblocks.

Mordechai, who visited the family of Ita Tzur, 42, and her son, Ephraim, 12, who were killed in the attack, demanded that the Palestinian Authority hand over the terrorists responsible for the shooting.

But the head of all Palestinian security forces in the West Bank, Jibril Rajoub, said that the Palestinian Authority had no intention of handing over the suspects.

Under the terms of the self-rule accords, suspected terrorists can be tried and punished within the self-rule areas.

Observers have noted that the Palestinian Authority consistently avoided extraditing terror suspects to Israel, fearing that the move would completely undermine its credibility among the Palestinian people.

But critics charge that the sentences imposed on convicted terrorists are merely token actions, adding that more than a few convicts have wound up with positions on the Palestinian security forces.

The act of terror prompted calls from Jewish settlement leaders for massive building in the territories. The leaders also issued a thinly veiled ultimatum that they would take the initiative themselves if the government did not.

While cabinet members emphasized that no decision was made to establish new Jewish settlements, the move was interpreted by Palestinians as another step toward changing facts on the ground in the territories.

Ahmed Karia, the speaker of the Palestinian legislative council, warned in an Israel Television interview that the council had called on Palestinians to "prepare for confrontation" against the Israeli government decision.

Senior Israeli security officials also warned that the government decision could spark new violence in the territories.

Fighting erupts in Lebanon

By NAOMI SEGAL
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — Fighting erupted in southern Lebanon over the weekend after rockets were fired across the border into northern Israel.

On Saturday, Hezbollah gunmen ambushed an Israeli convoy in the eastern sector of the security zone. The unit included the head of the Israel Defence Force liaison unit in southern Lebanon, Brig. Gen. Eli Amitai.

Amitai was lightly wounded from shrapnel. Another member of the unit was also lightly wounded.

The forces in the convoy immediately returned fire, killing one of the gunmen.

In subsequent searches in the area on Sunday, IDF forces came upon a wounded Hezbollah gunman and killed him.

Also Sunday, Israeli jets rocketed Hezbollah targets in southern Lebanon.

In another development, Israel submitted a complaint to the five-nation group monitoring a cease-fire in southern Lebanon to protest last Friday night's Katyusha rocket attack launched from southern Lebanon into the western Galilee.

The attack, which caused no injuries or property damage, was the first rocket assault on Israel since April, when the United States brokered a cease-fire that called on Israel and Hezbollah not to launch attacks from or target civilian areas on either side of the border.

Hezbollah leaders denied involvement in the rocket attack.

IDF officers said Palestinian groups operating in the coastal area, from where the rockets were launched, could be responsible.

Israeli officials said that attack was launched from an area under Lebanese control, adding that it was an outright violation of the April cease-fire.

PM, Arafat talk to ease tensions

Privately, however, Arafat has voiced anger at demands that he should consistently condemn Palestinian killings of Israelis, saying that neither Netanyahu nor other cabinet ministers have ever publicly condemned Israeli killings of Palestinians.

Arafat told reporters in Gaza: "As for the statements of the Israeli prime minister ...that we are preparing to wage war on them, this is untrue and aims at diverting attention from what he is preparing to do against us ... This government does not want peace."

Netanyahu said the opposition should instead be attacking "the clear attempt by the Palestinian Authority to ignite the area."

Meanwhile, Defence Minister Yitzhak Mordechai dismissed Palestinian warnings that supporting settlement expansion would gravely endanger the peace, saying the government would go ahead with the strengthening of Jewish settlements.

"We are aware of the threats and threats won't deter us. We advise the other side not to threaten us and to continue with the [peace] process which we have started," Mordechai said, "Together with this we have said time and again that settlement in Judea, Samaria, and the Gaza District is determined by the government of Israel."

He made the statements after a meeting with settler leaders, followed by a one-hour condolence call to the Tzur family.

Mordechai, who in his position has the last word in settlement construction, promised settler leaders to enlarge settlements, but he refused to elaborate. Beit El residents are pushing the IDF to let them build housing on adjacent army firing ranges, but neither would say whether this has been approved.

Mordechai was accompanied by Transportation Minister Yitzhak Levy, OC Central Command Maj.-Gen. Uzi Dayan, and Noah Kinarti, Mordechai's adviser on settlements.

In a related matter, Col. Jibril Rajoub, head of the Palestinian Preventive Security Service in the West Bank, said his men have arrested dozens of PFLP members.

He said mug shots of the PFLP suspects are to be given to Israel for Yoel Tzur to try to identify his attackers, but that Israel's demands for their extradition would be denied.

"We will never hand over anyone to the Israelis," Rajoub told the Associated Press. "We have our own courts and process. We will prosecute those responsible," he said.

Military sources say they have yet to receive any mug shots from the Palestinians.

Petrol bomb hits IDF car

By DAVID RUDGE
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — A petrol bomb thrown at an IDF command car patrolling the Syrian border last Friday evening set the vehicle alight. The soldiers, who were not injured, extinguished the flames.

The incident occurred near the Druse village of Majdal Shams on the eve of the anniversary of the Golan Heights Druse's six-week strike against the 1981 Knesset decision to extend Israeli law to the region.

It follows a series of nationalistic incidents over the past few months on the Golan Heights that were apparently perpetrated by pro-Syrian Druse. Last Friday's attack was one of the most serious and is being investigated by police, the army and the security services.

The other incidents included arson attacks on a police post in nearby Mas'ada village and on a building housing the Income Tax Authority office in Majdal Shams.

There also have been incidents of stone-throwing at police and civilian vehicles on the Golan Heights and an arson attack against a restaurant owned by the head of Bukata Local Council. Last month, another blaze which was started deliberately, gutted the dining room of a Swiss-style holiday village at Moshav Neveh Ativ on the upper slopes of Mt. Hermon.

Supt. Eliezer Binyamin, spokesman for the police's Galilee District, said police were investigating whether there was a link between these incidents and last Friday's attack.

"There is no evidence at the moment of any direct link between these incidents, but the possibility cannot be ruled out and we are investigating the matter," Binyamin said.

Turkey's Islamic PM opts for continuity

By SHELDON KIRSHNER

Mideast Analysis

Almost a year ago this week, the Islamic movement became a major political force in Turkey when the Welfare party won a plurality of parliamentary seats in the general election.

The party, led by Necmettin Erbakan, was unable to form a government, and so it was left to the secular right-of-centre bloc to cobble together a workable coalition.

Less than six months later, the shaky regime collapsed in a welter of mutual recriminations,and Erbakan, as the head of a new government, became Turkey's first Islamist prime minister.

The turn of events shocked Turkey's Western friends. In pre-election campaigning, Erbakan had referred to Israel as a "timeless enemy," had threatened to pull Turkey out of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization (NATO) and had promised to form closer ties with the Islamic world.

In retrospect, Erbakan has not fulfilled all his promises, hewing to well-worn paths at home and abroad.

He has not attempted to reverse Turkey's secularist traditions — the brainchild of Mustafa Kemal Ataturk — notwithstanding declarations about replacing Turkey's Western legal system with Islamic law.

He has not revoked Turkey's military agreement with Israel, the framework of which was signed last February.

He has not tried to withdraw from NATO and, indeed, has let the West go on using air bases on Turkish soil.

But in keeping faith with one of his pledges, he has established more neighborly relations with Iran, Iraq and Syria, all of which are on a U.S. list of states sponsoring international terrorism.

Erbakan's volte-face is a function of several factors.

• The Turkish armed forces, the custodian of Ataturk's secular legacy and the country's strongest institution, are steadfastly opposed to an Islamic revolution.

• The staunchly secular foreign minister, Tansu Ciller, has seized control of Turkey's external relations.

• Erbakan has decided not to rock the boat, hoping that his middle-of-the road policies will impress the mainly secular-minded electorate when elections are held again. If his strategy works, he may try through stealth to create an Islamic state in Turkey.

With this goal inspiring him, Erbakan is proceeding cautiously, particularly with respect to Israel.

After assuming office, Erbakan said that he would honor the military cooperation pact with Israel, provided it was in Turkey's national interest. The ambiguity of this remark alarmed Israel. But having satisfied himself that the pact benefits Turkey, Erbakan has brushed off pleas from Egypt, Syria, Iran and Saudi Arabia to scrap it.

Late in August, David Ivry, the director-general of the Israeli Ministry of Defence, signed an agreement in Ankara calling for further cooperation between Israel's and Turkey's defence industries.

On Dec. 7, following several delays construed in Israel as deliberate, Erbakan finally signed a deal under which Israel Aircraft Industries will modernize Turkey's aging fleet of American-built F-4 Phantom jets in factories in Israel and Turkey.

In tandem with these developments, Ciller and Turkey's president, Suleiman Demirel, both of whom have visited Israel in the past three years, have taken pains to assure the Israeli government and the Jewish community in the United States that Turkey will honor all its commitments to Israel.

Despite these pronouncements, Turkey — the first Muslim nation to recognize the Jewish state — appears to be reducing the visibility of its relationship with Israel.

Under instructions from Erbakan himself, Welfare party officials have been prohibited from contacting Israel embassy officials in Turkey. And in a calculated snub, Erbakan has not responded to an appeal from Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu for a dialogue.

Erbakan's aloof attitude to Israel, while not surprising, is not without precedence in Turkish-Israeli relations. Until only a few years ago, Turkey, in deference to Arab sensitivities, maintained low-level ties with Israel, resisting calls for ambassadorial links.

Turkey warmed up to Israel in 1993, the turning point having been Israel's rapprochement with the PLO and the beginning of the Oslo peace process.

But since the advent of the Erbakan era, one wonders whether Israel can sustain its current friendship with Turkey far into the future.

The popularity of the Welfare party is clearly on the ascendancy, not only because voters are fed up with the culture of corruption represented by mainstream secular parties, but because politicians like Erbakan have deftly tapped into the anger and the frustration of the grinding poverty which affects tens of millions of Turks.

Should Erbakan succeed in convincing the majority of Turks that he is an honest and efficient leader, he may well have a chance to win an outright victory in the next election. And if he does, he will surely downgrade Turkey's relations with Israel.

Documents: Swiss facilitated transfer of Nazis to Argentina

By DANIEL KURTZMAN
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

WASHINGTON — The search for looted Nazi gold and missing Jewish assets from the Holocaust continues to produce staggering findings at virtually every turn.

Newly released documents have confirmed long-held suspicions that the Nazis transferred their wealth to Argentina for safekeeping during World War II.

But what had not been known until now is that the Swiss may have helped transport Nazis and their plundered assets to Buenos Aires, as documents uncovered by the World Jewish Congress (WJC) and the Senate Banking Committee suggest.

A 1946 U.S. diplomatic memo released last week by Senator Alfonse D'Amato, who chairs the banking committee, said U.S. diplomats suspected that high-level Nazi officials, including Hermann Goering and Joseph Goebbels, were using Swiss diplomatic pouches to send their wealth to Argentina during the war.

The document cited accusations "that Nazi German capital is escaping in Swiss diplomatic pouches, probably without the knowledge of the Swiss federal government, because of the government's practice of entrusting diplomatic missions to its bankers and businessmen travelling to the Western Hemisphere."

D'Amato sent a pointed letter last week to Carlo Jagmetti, Switzerland's ambassador to the United States, demanding an explanation.

Swiss officials denied any prior knowledge of the reports contained in the memo and have dismissed it as hearsay.

Thomas Borer, Switzerland's main spokesperson on the issue of Switzerland's wartime role, accused D'Amato of using unverified documents and presenting them as fact.

Meanwhile, additional documents have surfaced alleging that the Swiss government turned a substantial profit by providing Germans with phony documents needed to flee to Argentina.

Hungary expected to extend Holocaust compensation

By BATSHEVA TSUR
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — The Hungarian parliament is expected to approve amendments to that country's third compensation law which will extend compensation to a larger number of people, including Holocaust survivors living in Israel, according to Zoltan Szabo, Hungary's deputy education minister.

Szabo is one of two government representatives on the Hungarian committee that decides on compensation for victims of the Nazis in Hungary.

The bill could be adopted by parliament in February 1997, after the New Year's recess, Szabo said this weekend during a private visit to Israel.

The third compensation law, adopted by the Communist government, was found to be wanting by Hungary's (Supreme) Constitution Court and modifications to it are currently under debate in the parliament, he said. It deals with compensation to persons deprived of their liberty or life.

Szabo said that the court found unconstitutional the section of the law dealing with forced laborers taken to the frontier for non-military service.

Under the original paragraphs of the law, noncombatants were excluded and compensation was paid only to combat recruits, he said. The amended bill would include those recruited by the Hungarian army for forced labor of all kinds.

Another amendment, Szabo said, would be to the clauses which grant compensation only to victims' spouses. The court ruled that children, parents, brothers and sisters would also be eligible for such compensation and the parliament is expected to amend the law accordingly.

He said that Israeli citizens of Hungarian origin could be affected by the changes, but could not estimate how many people were involved.

There are currently 100,000 Jews living in Hungary.

Author discusses his book-come musical Ragtime

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to the CJN

TORONTO — During a recent public interview at Harbourfront, New York-area author E.L. Doctorow displayed his wit and literary sensitivity as he answered questions on the writing of his most famous novel Ragtime and the musical adaptation now playing in Toronto, his habits as a writer, his definition of historical fiction and his opinion of Holocaust denial.

Doctorow said he began Ragtime while feeling emotionally depleted after completing a previous novel, The Book of Daniel. "I was sitting in my study, staring up at the wall in a house in New Rochelle built in 1906, and I started writing about the wall," he said. "That's the kind of day you have sometimes as a writer. Soon I was writing about what things were like in 1906. One thing led to another and I was off on this book."

At an early stage Doctorow used the working title Buffalo Nickel, and he wrote so the book would be accessible to as many readers as possible, he admitted. "My purpose was to finish writing the book and to hope that it would be read by more than the usual 3,000 people." (To date, some seven million copies of Ragtime have been sold.)

Since the book is set in the past, could it be considered historical fiction? "I don't know what historical fiction is," Doctorow replied. "I think that's a genre for people who write their books in the past and delight in describing for their readers how people dressed...and how they sent rocks crashing into the castle walls. If that's historical fiction, I don't think I write that.

"Also, a writer in that genre makes a distinction between the past and the present. I can't make that distinction. I don't know when the past is. I don't know how it's different than the present. Every book I write is about my life. My definition of a historical novel is one that endures in history. All novels are historical fiction, written after the fact."

Foggy boundary between history and myth

He cited classics like Leo Tolstoy's War and Peace, Mark Twain's Adventures of Tom Sawyer and Nathaniel Hawthorne's Scarlet Letter, describing them as historical novels that easily transcend categorization in a subgenre of historical fiction.

"I remember when I turned in the manuscript of Ragtime and an editor said, 'You know, you tend to set your manuscripts in the past.' I was stunned. I said, 'By God, you're right.' I didn't realize it."

Given the foggy boundary between history and myth, is it possible for someone to write a supreme novel in which the Holocaust is denied? "No, that's ridiculous," Doctorow said without a moment's hesitation. "There are some facts that are so momentous and so huge that nothing can be done to them and nothing should be done to them, and certainly the Holocaust is that kind of fact.

"This sinful, evil attempt to deny the Holocaust highlights the perception many people share that history is really up for grabs. History is being fought over all the time, and it's a battlefield. It was Orwell who showed us that whoever controls the past controls the present...What we need is a multiplicity of witnesses so that whatever the historical reality is, it doesn't come out of one channel."

How and when does E.L. Doctorow write? "You want the truth? The truth is you work every day, you get up and go to work like everybody else. Writing generates writing, you can't sit down and wait for it to happen. If you're a runner you have to run every day, you can't just wait for race day, so it's the same thing."

Doctorow said he is thrilled by Livent's masterful production of Ragtime. "The show finds the implicit allegory of the text, and I'm delighted about that."

Hadn't he found even one small flaw in the musical? "The thing that got me more upset than anything is that I was not even offered a walk-on," he jibed. "You'd think they'd have the good grace — but maybe in the touring company."

Ragtime Opening A Gala Affair

Theatre Notes

• Notables attending the post-show reception for the opening of Ragtime at North York's Ford Centre included author E.L. Doctorow, mayors Mel Lastman and Barbara Hall, provincial Attorney General Charles Harnick, former lieutenant governor Lincoln Alexander, and many guests from the New York theatre community and Toronto's financial community.

Musical entertainment was provided by the Mazik Klezmer Band, a five-person Montreal ensemble. After sampling some of the food, cast members mingled with the guests in the grand lobby. The play's Little Boy and Little Girl, Paul Franklin Dano and Lea Michele, were among those who had to be dragged off the dance floor at evening's end.

Food for 2,400 persons was provided by three caterers, and there was hardly a bite left over. The four food stations boasted large photographs of various New York neighborhoods in the first decade of this century, such as Hester Street and the Lower East Side, Mulberry Street and Union Square. A variety of ethnic foods were offered. Nostalgia has never tasted so good.

Film Notes

• Laugh your way through a host of Jewish film comedies by such greats as Woody Allen, Jerry Lewis, Mel Brooks, Albert Brooks and the Marx Brothers. Then get serious as you grapple with questions like: What is Jewish humor? How has it changed in the last 50 years? How does it differ from other kinds of humor?

The occasion is the course Jewish Humor In Film, Part 2 (Part 1 is not a prerequisite), presented by the Toronto Jewish Film Festival. The series of six screenings starts Jan. 15, Bloor St. JCC, 6:30 to 9:30 p.m. $65. 416-324-8600.

•The Israeli film Summer of Aviya, fresh from its unprecedented 12-week run in Toronto, opened earlier this month at the Fifth Avenue Cinemas in Vancouver. The award-winning film is based on a best-selling autobiographical novel by Israeli actor Gila Almagor, as is its sequel, Under the Domim Tree, which is slated for a Jan. 17 opening in the same movie house.

Literary Notes

• Elaine Kalman Naves speaks on her new book Journey to Vaja: Reconstructing the World of a Hungarian Family, at the next Jewish Genealogical Society meeting, Shaarei Shomayim Synagogue, Dec. 18, 7:30 p.m. Non-members $1. Naves, a Montreal-area writer and journalist, is a literary columnist for the Montreal Gazette and has written a radio documentary Journey to Vaja for the CBC series Ideas.

•Linda Frum has done a wonderful job in capturing her late mother's warmth, intelligence and exceptional journalistic talents in the recently-published Barbara Frum: A Daughter's Memoir (Random House, $29.95), reviewed recently in these pages.

A journalistic legend who anchored As It Happens for CBC Radio and later The Journal for CBC TV, Barbara Frum succumbed in 1992 to the leukemia that she had been quietly fighting behind the scenes for many years.

As it happens, I had the pleasure of being interviewed by Frum on As It Happens. Back about 1980, I was one of two writers who had been asked to write articles for Weekend Magazine on, of all silly topics, the 50th anniversary of striptease. The art department took full creative liberties with the illustrations.

The results were wonderful, but decidedly adult. Seven of the 23 Canadian daily newspapers that carried Weekend dropped that issue from their Saturday papers. (Five were out West, the other two in the Maritimes.)

"How does it feel to be a banned writer?" Frum began.

Her intelligent questions inspired thoughtful answers. And her warmth didn't shut off once the interview was concluded.

"Congratulations," she told us after we finished taping. "This will make your careers."

Knesset approves more cuts

By DAVID HARRIS
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — Israel's cabinet, approved a NIS 1.8 billion ($.8 billion Cdn.) cut in the 1997 budget last week.

That's in addition to the $2 billion cut agreed upon in July.

The cut is split between direct reductions in expenditures and from a variety of other sources.

Despite a promise to the contrary by Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu on the eve of the meeting, the defence budget will be cut by 0.5 percent.

Prior to the meeting, Education Minister Zevulun Hammer said he would vote against the proposals, because of the intention to cut some $105 million from his budget.

However, in a show of sympathy led by Trade Minister Natan Sharansky, all the other ministries agreed to dig deeper into their own pockets to ensure the education budget is only cut by 0.65 percent, instead of the initial 1.3 percent.

During their presentation to the cabinet, Finance Ministry officials said the additional cut is essential to prevent a slowdown in growth and immigration; to avoid increased unemployment and inflation; to guarantee there is no difficulty in funding imports; and to ensure the improvement in the general quality of life is not reversed.

Bank completes loan for Israel

TEL-AVIV — Bank Hapoalim has completed a landmark term loan of FFR 1.1 billion ($4 billion Cdn.) for Israel, Rafi Ben-Ami, chief representative for the bank in Canada said.

The loan was completed at an all-time low lending rate – .25 percent over the London Inter-Bank Offer Rate for the first five years of the seven-year term.

Travel Talk

by Bill Gladstone

Tis the season for departures. Joe is leaving for Cuba, Sheryl for Argentina, Nick and Nora for California, Pat for Patagonia. For once, I am left behind, wishing bon voyage to others and asking that time-worn question, "Are you sure you can't take me along inside your luggage?"

Time now for my perennial review of the pile of material on my desk from tourist offices, consulates, agents, convention and visitors bureaus, and assorted others.

* * *

U.K. Toll-Free Number: The British Tourist Authority has introduced a toll-free number for Canadians, offering an improved information service from coast to coast. The number, 1- 888-VISIT UK, is now in operation, sponsored for the first year by Thistle Hotels. Callers within the Toronto area should continue to call 416-925-6326.

In 1995, the number of Canadian visitors to Britain rose by 10 percent to 626,000.

* * *

Miami Stats: According to the Greater Miami Convention and Visitors Bureau, 1993 was the biggest year ever for Canadian tourism to Miami (596,000 visitors). However, after the highly publicized safety problems, tourism dropped sharply. Then, thanks to the introduction of a series of effective law enforcement and safety initiatives, Canadian visitation started to rise again.

In the past year, Miami experienced a 26 percent growth in Canadian tourism. Some 530,000 Canadians are expected in 1996.

Miami law enforcement programs such as the Tourist Oriented Police Squad (TOPS) and the Tourist Robbery Abatement Program (TRAP) have become models for other cities interested in improving visitor safety. For information on travel to Miami, phone 1-800-955-3646.

Tracking the Wild West: In Arizona, discover the Wild West on a scenic rail journey with the San Pedro & Southwestern Railroad. The trip begins in the southeastern Arizona town of Benson and heads south into the pristine San Pedro Riparian National Conservation Area, known for its many birds and silver mills. The four-hour trip includes the ruins of Contention, the ghost town of Fairbank, and narrated stories about legends like Doc Holiday, Wyatt Earp, Geronimo and the Clanton brothers. 520-586-2266.

Hotel Happenings: Four Seasons Regent Hotels and Resorts have snagged top honors in several annual travel industry surveys, including the exclusive Travel & Leisure Magazine readers' poll. The Four Seasons Resort Maui heads the magazine's list of Top 50 Tropical Resorts, and another 15 Four Seasons Regent properties were include in the Traveller's Top 100.

Inter-Continental Hotels and Resorts has introduced a new Internet service that allows users to view color photos of all its properties and to book and confirm reservations at Inter-Continental, Forum and Global Partner hotels worldwide. The Web site is located at [http://www.interconti.com/].

Celiac disease affects nutrient absorption

By LEILA SPEISMAN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO —It is hard to imagine not being able to have cake at a friend's birthday party. Or going out for pizza. Or chowing down on sufganiot at the office Chanukah party.

But that is reality for the estimated one in 2,000 with celiac disease, a medical condition in which gluten, a protein found in wheat, barley, oats, spelt and rye, affects the absorptive surface of the small intestine.

The body is unable to absorb nutrients necessary for good health: protein, fat, carbohydrates, vitamins and minerals.

Symptoms range from virtually non-existent to severe bloating, gas, diarrhea, weight loss, anemia and fatigue. While celiac disease is not fatal in itself, if left untreated it can cause other serious problems.

Current research seems to indicate that there is a relationship between untreated celiac disease and such life-threatening illnesses as lymphoma and cancer of the gastro-intestinal tract.

While research is being done in the United States to diagnose celiac disease by blood testing, at the moment, diagnosis is by a duodenal biopsy.

Until recently, diagnosis was usually made in infancy or childhood. Now, it is recognized that it is a lifelong condition, needing lifelong care, and can be diagnosed at any age.

Audrey Kaufman, head nurse at the Cosmetic Surgery Hospital in Woodbridge, knows all about celiac disease. And not only because for 12 years she was a nurse at the endoscopy unit at Mount Sinai hospital, the department where the diagnosis is made.

She herself has celiac disease.

She told The CJN that she was one of those people who had no symptoms. Going to her physician for a routine check-up, she was told that she had severe anemia.

"I didn't believe it," she said, and had the tests redone."

When iron therapy didn't help the anemia, she went to a hematologist, an endocrinologist, and finally to her own endoscopy department for the biopsy, which gave a positive diagnosis for celiac disease.

Again, she refused to believe it.

"I went through the same stages as with any loss — denial, anger, depression and finally acceptance."

Acceptance means adherence to a rigid diet, avoiding all foods containing gluten. This is not as straightforward as it sounds, as gluten is not just found in such expected places as cakes, breads and pastas.

"There are many hidden sources of gluten in prepared foods," Kaufman explained, including luncheon meats, drugs, baking powder, icing sugar, spices, soup mixes, soy sauce, and some soda pop.

"You have to read labels very carefully. Even yogurt and sour cream may have gluten. If an ingredient list says 'modified starch,' for instance, it may be cornstarch or potato starch, which is OK, or it may be wheat starch, which isn't."

Fortunately, the Specialty Food Shop at the Hospital for Sick Children carries many gluten-free foods, and Sterks Bakery in Vineland ships gluten-free bread and bagels and flour, so she can do her own baking.

"I am aware that I am on a constant diet, but I am also aware of how good I feel. It doesn't stop me from doing anything, eating in restaurants, or travelling."

Kaufman acknowledged that it is more difficult with children, where peer pressure may make it more difficult to accept the dietary limitations.

However, she pointed out, "so many people have allergies that everyone is more aware of food problems and is more supportive — even kids."

Information and advice is available from the Canadian Celiac Association, 905-567-7195. The association also offers the Celiac Help Line, 416-781-9140, or 1-800-363-7296 toll-free across Canada.

Israeli research may explain 'Gulf War syndrome'

By JUDY SIEGEL
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — Israeli researchers have found that stress can disarm the "blood/brain barrier" that protects the brain from drugs and other chemicals in the circulatory system.

The discovery helps explain the different reaction in peace and in war to the drug pyridostigmine, which was given to U.S. and Israeli soldiers during the Gulf War to protect them against chemical weapon attacks by Saddam Hussein.

The research by Hebrew University neurobiologist Prof. Hermona Soreq and Dr. Alon Friedman, a Soroka Hospital neurosurgeon who was an IDF doctor during the Gulf War, was published recently in Nature Medicine.

More than half a million U.S. soldiers were given prophylactic doses of pyridostigmine during the 1991 war, and some IDF soldiers received it for a short time as well.

Soreq said the research conducted on mice was important, because it meant people under conditions of stress should get a lower dose of medication.

IDF soldiers who were given the drug during peacetime in clinical trials suffered from relatively mild side effects, such as sweating, mild diarrhea, excessive urination and salivation, as well as stomach pains. But 24 percent of those who received the drug during wartime complained of dizziness, headaches, nervousness and reduced concentration — central nervous system symptoms that showed the drug had reached the brain. U.S. soldiers complained about long-term symptoms, but the cause has never been proven.

The brain is unique among organs in that, due to the special compressed structure of its tissues, few chemicals are known to pass into it from the blood. Substances pass from the capillaries to cells, and then to other cells through a pump-like mechanism. Pyridostigmine is regarded as the most effective drug for preventing nerve gas from killing those exposed to it, and until now, it was thought that the drug did not pass the blood/brain barrier.

U.S. skater on the way up

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Eve Chalom admits to being just a little awestruck when she and her partner Mathew Gates hit the ice in Kitchener at the recent Skate Canada dance competition.

After all, up to that point in their careers they'd competed against skaters ranked from 15th to 30th in the world. Skate Canada was different altogether. There, many of the world's best skaters had gathered and the rankings ranged from third to 15th.

"We weren't used to this type of competition," Chalom, 17, conceded afterwards. "There were very highly placed couples."

Still, their seventh place finish (out of 10) was more than respectable for the unranked duo and gives some indication that the youthful couple are on their way up in the world of international ice dance.

After Skate Canada, Chalom and Gates, 21, travelled to Gelsinchirken, Germany for the Nation's Cup, one of six major events on dance skaters' winter calendars. Again, the competition was world-class and with the extra experience of Skate Canada, they skated better, even if the results didn't show it.

"We were more comfortable, had better speed and made fewer mistakes," Chalom said. Their improved performance was good for a ninth place finish out of 12 competing couples.

The Russia Cup, held last weekend in St. Petersburg, was next on their agenda and will be followed by other national events leading up to the World Championships in Lausanne next March. Based on their abilities and their previous performances, they can be expected to finish somewhere between 15th and 20th, Eve's mother, Susan, predicted.

In the world of ice dancing, where judges are ultra conservative and top-ranked skaters practically have to skate into the boards or throw a partner into the third row to drop in the rankings, good young skaters can expect to spend years climbing up the rankings ladder. That can be frustrating for a young couple who are otherwise top skaters, Susan said.

Still and all, Chalom (pronounced Shalom) and Gates are making remarkable progress. Last year, they finished third in the United States Ice Dancing Championships while the year before, they won the Junior National Championships.

Chalom and Gates have matched well ever since they skated together in Boston for the first time four years ago. Liz Coates, who'd seen Gates skate in England and who coached Chalom in Detroit, thought the two would match up well. She was right. The two hit it off right from the start.

"They were a fabulous match," Chalom's mother Susan said. "Their body and facial movements looked coordinated right from day one."

Mathew Gates and Eve Chalom on ice.

They began to train together at Chalom's home rink, the Detroit Skating Club in Bloomfield Hills, Mich. in June 1992 and six months later they won the U.S. Novice title at the '93 U.S. Championships in Phoenix. They followed up that victory with a third place finish in the Juniors competition at the 1994 U.S. Championships and a year later they won the Junior title.

Even before they met, Chalom was an old hand when it came to skating. She took up the sport at age 8 – "kind of late compared to other people," she said.

Even as a youngster, she loved the sport. "I liked going faster than you could walking or running and it was kind of exciting," she said. Ice dancing came naturally to her as dance was an activity taken up by her entire family.

Her mother Susan and father Edward have enjoyed folkdancing for 35 years and at one time, performed with the Detroit Folk Dance Club. The three of them and Chalom's brother Adam all took Spanish flamenco dance lessons together and put on a show.

On the ice, she and Gates perform sambas, waltzes, cha-chas and tangos, the classic ballroom dances. "Eve's got a tremendous sense of rhythm," Susan said. "You can see it in her whole body. She's not just skating, she's dancing out there."

Ice dance differs from pairs skating in that the latter employs more lifts and jumps while dance stresses more artistry, style and choreography. Ice dancers must skate to "dance music," maintain recognizable dance holds and positions and can only separate briefly while changing positions.

Hearing the music is not proving to be a problem for Chalom, who suffered a 50 percent hearing loss in one ear and a 65 percent loss in the other as a result of being hit by a car while riding on the back of a babysitter's bicycle at age four.

She employs a hearing aid and has learned sign language. In fact, when she enters college next year, she plans to study American sign language and education.

Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu and his wife Sarah vacationed last week in the Negev. Unfortunately, the vacation ended abruptly when Etta and Ephraim Tsur were murdered near Beit El. As speculation increases in Israel about an impending agreement with the Palestinians on Hebron, pundits are now focusing their attention on the shape of a final deal. In the accompanying article, David Makovsky of the Jerusalem Post describes the possible parameters of a territorial compromise in Judea and Samaria. [RNS/Reuters]

Bibi's choices after Hebron

BY DAVID MAKOVSKY
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

Most of the public assumes that after a Hebron pullback, all the other thorny issues of the peace process are on hold until 1999, when so-called "final status" talks on a variety of issues, including Jerusalem, are expected to be concluded.

Commentary

In fact, the future is almost now. Due to a key section of the Oslo 2 interim agreement, the Palestinians believe they are entitled to no less than almost the entire West Bank by next September – before final status talks even begin. Settlements would become islands in a Palestinian sea, as opposed to the present situation where the Palestinians are more like islands in an Israeli sea.

Differences on this issue, known by the acronym FRDs ("further redeployments" or IDF pullbacks), will not only surface in the months ahead, but are one of the main elements blocking the Hebron deal. Palestinian Authority (PA) leader Yasser Arafat wants an affirmation from Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu that he will carry out three pullbacks by next September. Israel, according to Arafat, has already missed the September 1996 deadline for a first FRD.

But Netanyahu, realizing the complexity of these redeployments, wants to skip the whole issue and go directly to the final status. Ironically, in the past Israel has viewed the interim agreement as the key to dealing with painful issues of final status. But Israel now wants a final status approach, while the Palestinians have discovered the redeeming features of the interim agreement. Arafat's adviser Ahmed Tibi reflected a broader view among the Palestinian leadership when he said, "Israel cannot get out of fulfilling the interim agreement."

With either the pullbacks or the less likely alternative of going to final status, the public should soon be getting a better – but perhaps not a complete – grasp of how Netanyahu envisions a final status deal with the Palestinians and how he intends getting there.

The deep-felt concern about the next phase of the peace process has been the biggest force fuelling both stepped-up calls within Netanyahu's own coalition for a national unity government, and calls for moving directly to final status talks. A package deal on final status issues would avoid, in the eyes of some, the "salami-like" approach to yielding slices of the territories now, depriving Israel of any future negotiating leverage.

Whether by way of further interim pullbacks or final status talks, it is critical that the Netanyahu government has a vision of how it wants the talks with the Palestinians to end. While there have been a flurry of territorial ideas on the future status of the West Bank, for clarity's sake it is useful to look at three different paradigms.

• Cantons. The first approach is one that Ariel Sharon calls "cantons" and Arafat derisively calls "Bantustan," in allusion to the old South African homelands idea. The idea is to ensure the Palestinians have no territorial contiguity between their cities, so that they could never form a state.

In Netanyahu's book A Place Among the Nations, published three years ago, he endorses this idea, but uses the American name of "counties."

However, the Oslo accord has apparently made Netanyahu think his old ideas are unworkable. By the eve of the May elections, Netanyahu had distanced himself from this. When asked then by the Post what he thought about cantons, he responded, "I think they are not going to put us in isolated little islands and we are not going to do it to them either."

If Netanyahu does not accept the canton idea, the government should not therefore seek to expand the Jewish settlements alongside densely populated Palestinian areas in the heartland of the West Bank, settlements which were mostly established by Sharon in the late 1970s and early 1980s for this purpose. For example, it would be hard to understand the logic of plans to expand places such as Nahliel, which is just northeast of Ramallah, as suggested in the Washington Post this week by settlement leaders .

• The Third Way. This plan calls for Israeli territorial presence along two columns, namely western Samaria and the Jordan Valley, providing Israel with just under half of the territories.

One official in the Prime Minister's Office said: "Our territorial ideas and the Third Way's are very similar. Anybody who thinks we can significantly expand in the middle of Judea and Samaria is mistaken."

At a meeting with Jordan Valley settlers earlier this month, Netanyahu declared that Israel wanted to annex this area in final status talks. Of course, in a move laden with symbolism, it should be recalled that Netanyahu took Dan Shomron, who headed the Third Way for a brief period, as his chief negotiator.

• Beilin-Abu Mazen. This idea, whose outlines were agreed upon last year by two architects of the original Oslo accord, Yossi Beilin and Mahmoud Abbas (known by the patronym Abu Mazen), based on a plan by Yitzhak Frankenthal of the religious peace movement Netivot Shalom, calls for Israel to annex seven percent of the territory where an estimated 75 percent of the settlers live, in return for Palestinian statehood.

According to the Frankenthal plan, Israel would not need to annex a single Arab village while annexing settlement blocs in Gush Etzion, Ma'aleh Adumim and western Samaria as a part of border modifications.

When Netanyahu notes how Labor expanded existing settlements by about 40 percent over the last four years, it should be noted that this growth took place within what Yitzhak Rabin considered the "Greater Jerusalem" area, embracing Gush Etzion and Ma'aleh Adumim along with some building slightly east of the Green Line in western Samaria.

This is Netanyahu's dilemma, and perhaps even his opportunity.

The Inside Back

About Life

Dear Ella,

My mother and I are constantly fighting over one thing. She will not take a taxi. There is no logical reason she can give me, she just won't. I can't begin to tell you the pressure this puts on me.

I have a family of my own, I drive car pool twice a day, I make meals for a family of four every day and I do all the household chores, errands and shopping. This really leaves me very little time to drive my mother around and she just won't understand.

Even if I put my foot down and refuse, I am consumed by guilt the entire day. I play the conversation over and over again in my head and rationalize why I did the right thing. I'm willing to try anything to take this pressure off myself. Do you have any suggestions?

Chauffeur – NOT

Dear Chauffeur – NOT,

This is not the first time I've heard of this situation. It existed in my own home as well. I'm not sure what it is about taxis that forces an intelligent person to become completely irrational.

I've narrowed it down to three things.

First, money. Set up an account with a cab company. Give your mother the phone number and tell her whenever she needs to go somewhere, to call this number and it won't cost her anything.

Second, companionship. This could be an excuse for her to see her busy daughter. She might be feeling lonely and/or neglected and needs some extra TLC. Maybe a daily routine would help. Try to set up her day so that she keeps busy, preferably with other people in her situation and age group. Possibly have her join the Bernard Betel Centre and get her involved in programs there.

Third and hardest to solve, respect. Your mother may feel, if she has a daughter to drive her around, why should she have to take a taxi? A mother is important and should come first. What kind of a daughter would let her own mother drive with a stranger?

This is obviously an old-fashioned way of thinking. Try to reassure your mother that you love and respect her, but your time is limited. This will not help you with your guilt. That is something you'll need to tend to from your end.

Take comfort in knowing that you are not alone in this "Taxi Boycotting" dilemma. Talk to your friends and see how they handle it. You may get some good ideas. In the meantime, keep in mind that you are only human and there are only so many hours in a day. Do the best you can.

Building the academic bridge

One of the important bridges between two countries is the academic one. Consulates can and do play an important role in encouraging these ties and try to act as a link; indeed this is one of our current projects.

Various exchange programs have been established in virtually all of the universities across Canada and Israel enabling students to spend a year or more in the other country. This is a wonderful opportunity for young people to travel abroad, learn a new language and appreciate a new culture and society. Students in all fields can easily find a university with a suitable program which meets their needs and interests — whether it be in the liberal arts, fine arts, sciences, law or any other field. In fact, it is easy to transfer credits between most of the universities in Israel and Canada.

Many students have taken advantage of these programs. Over the years, the exchange programs have grown, with hundreds of students travelling to Israel from Canada each year. For Canadian students going to Israel, there are scholarships and bursaries in place to help those students who require financial assistance.

Beyond the many student programs, we, along with the universities, are also trying to encourage academic exchanges of professors. Each year a number of academics from Israel travel to Canada either as visiting scholars at one of the many institutions of higher learning here, or as researchers at some of the hospitals, often the Hospital for Sick Children, Mount Sinai or Baycrest.

Not only do Israeli doctors and researchers bring new methods and techniques, theories and knowledge at the end of their sabbaticals, they also return to Israel with new expertise acquired from these renowned institutions. The academics are very often willing to address the community in lectures and seminars. This is an opportunity which more organizations should take advantage of.

Our consulate is also endeavoring to promote further academic ties. In fact, we are in the process of trying to establish a Chair in Israel Studies at one of the universities here. Once one such Chair is established, hopefully others will follow.

Over the years, scholars such as Gabriel Ben-Dor (political science), Arye Rattner (sociology), Alexander Bligh (history) and Itamar Rabinovich (Middle East history) have spent a year or more in Toronto. This is but a sampling. We are also in the process of developing a relatively new program, Visiting Scholars, which seeks to bring top Israeli academics on short visits.

Last year, for example, we helped to bring professors David Menashri (Iranian history and politics) and Yehezkel Dror (political science) to Toronto to speak at the University of Toronto and York University. This academic year, Prof. Yoseph Nevo (history) will visit Toronto for a period of two days at the beginning of February. These short visits are important in maintaining and fostering ties, establishing relations and sharing new research.

Similarly, many Canadian professors visit Israel frequently in many capacities. There is a well-established Canadian studies program in Israel which attracts Canadianists from across the globe — be they historians, political scientists or lawyers. Canadian experts in various fields travel to Israel to meet with colleagues, to compare the work being done and again, to share any new findings and theories in their fields.

In an age when there are significant budgetary constraints on the universities, it is important to continue to encourage the sharing of information, the familiarization of each other's educational systems and to expand our partnerships. In the last century, academic exchanges have helped enormously in improving relations between countries as well as having advanced knowledge generally.
